The future of marriage thus forecast by Mr. Spencer, a clear and comprehensive authority on sociology, contains a little corroboration of the free-love theory, it is true; but the present fashion in which free-lovers work out the theory falls far short of Mr. Spencer's ideal marriage. The theory, however, need not be treated with condemnation nor apprehension. It is one of the links in a long chain of conditions by which the competent shall in the far future blind men and women together for the highest and purest realization of the ideal marriage. The insistence upon the public recognition of the moral bond above the legal bond in marriage will grow out of the present recreancy to marriage refinements, out of offences against the purity of life, out of the scandalous degradation that disgraces present public morality. The moral regeneration of the world is to begin with the ideal marriage of one man with one woman; that man and that woman to possess first the ideal individual character, and then, as Mrs. Anna Spencer beautifully expresses it, "purge the decisions leading to marriage more and more of sensuality, and call wisdom as well as love into the high council-chamber that determines the happiness or unhappiness of two human beings, and fatefully predicts the inheritance of others."

Public sentiment will be educated by sad and shocking experiences, if in no other way, to see through social shams, though they be legalized. The aim of the competent shall be to secure the healthy education of the public opinion, and to promote purity of life and conduct in the phase of associated life we know as marriage, as well as in all the other relations in which human beings are associated. It becomes the duty of every intelligent and right-minded reformer to aid in the general enlightenment which is to produce this healthier public sentiment, this finer system of future family ethics, that is to be "based," as Mr. Abbot affirms and as I agree, "upon the scientific method." Men and women are needed now, if ever, who shall insist upon the elevation of character, upon the elevation of the general standard of conduct, as the primary agents in eradicating existing social evils, especially in the marriage state. There is no time to lose in deploring the present conditions; there is no need of half-hearted fear that any fanaticism is to overturn the best there is in the present established relations of men and women. There is no time, as a poet says,—

"To sicken and to swoon,
When science reaches forth her arms
To feel from world to world, and charms
Her secret from the latest moon."

The secrets of human failures in sociological experiments will yet be charmed by science from the onward march of human lives, and the standard of marital relations will be elevated to a height only dreamt of by a few enthusiasts to-day. Science is taking the destiny of humanity in her careful hands, and looks backward as well as forward, seeking the causes which have hindered the highest development of the race. In heredity she discovers causes; in physical laws she discovers cures. Sanitation is a watchword of science, and the promotion of physical health is coming to be understood to mean the promotion of moral health. Enlightenment upon many physiological laws that are now misunderstood, or of which men and women are wholly ignorant, will do more than anything else to establish perfect marital relations. Perfect health will promote happiness. Biological remedies of existing evils will be applied with more efficacy than legal remedies. Public regulations, national and local boards of health, comprehensive sanitary laws, rational methods of living, rational ideas of religion, better methods of early education, new conventions of family life which recognize equality of men and women, each and all will lend aid to a reorganization or a modification of the marriage system, and enable the race to evolve higher, nobler, and purer conditions, consistent with, and the outcome of, the ideal monogamic marriage. Violations of physical laws will then be counted greater crimes to the social body than the breaking of statutes, and the welfare of society will be enhanced by the sacred discharge of public duty to maintain the highest state of physical health in the individual. With the substructure of perfect health and the superstructure of rationalism, reason will temper emotion, and emotion will illuminate reason. Fealty to these higher laws which govern human intelligence in the marriage relation will be no longer questionable. There will be no provocation to disobey them. This marriage state, ideal as yet, will fit in so naturally and satisfactorily to the order of things that the restraints now imposed upon an evolving race will be either gradually removed or else come to be regarded as of little moment, in comparison with the general good, if restitutions are still needed. Wholesome laws will no longer be offensive to private judgments, and there will be no chafing against them by loving men and women loyal to principle, who, loving liberty, love still more dearly the public weal.

This future picture is not pure fancy. There are plenty of materials at hand, in the stupendous efforts of science to make mankind better, healthier, happier, with which to color the glowing portraits of the coming man and woman, the coming family. Superstition slinks away from the rays of science.

The climax of mankind's grand upward march from the bestial to the intellectual is that sublime unselfishness that waives "private judgments" cheerfully, that adds to the consensus of the competent its mite of wisdom and experience whereby theories shall be reduced to the practical carrying out of the various phases of associated life. The wisest men and women will be content to "wait" for a wiser future to determine whether they are right or wrong, and so waiting, hopefully, courageously, will perchance some day see their pet plan "based on private judgment" divested of its crudeness and vagueness, engrafted on the common stock of judgment of the competent, and serving the highest needs of humanity.

AMELIA W. BATE.

[Let us remind those who write on this subject that we have never assumed that existing laws as they are express the Consensus of the Competent even of to-day. On the contrary, we pointed out at the very outset, in our address on "The Final Appeal in Morals" (THE INDEX, March 6) that "the laws constantly need to be reformed in accordance with the rulings of this supreme tribunal." Free-love proposes to repeal, and not to reform, the existing laws of marriage. Science turns her back on this crude destructionism, and teaches the law of evolution.—Ed.]

CRITERIA OF CERTITUDE.

In common parlance we use the word belief in a very loose manner, implying almost any degree of probability from the highest to the lowest, but always something short of certitude; but the whole value of a creed depends upon precision, and no one can doubt that whenever the word occurs in the church creeds it is meant to signify the highest degree of assurance,—that is to say, positive conviction. Yet this double sense of the word has given rise to an unfortunate confusion, and affords, no doubt, the explanation of an extraordinary contention which has been raised by some celebrated Christian apologists, especially by Butler in the Analogy, by Canon Farrar, and by Mr. Gladstone in the May number of the Nineteenth Century, that since, in Butler's own words, "to us, probability is the very guide of life," that, therefore, we ought in reason to be satisfied to believe without being sure. Gladstone quotes with a great deal of gusto the following sentence from Voltaire:—

"L'incertitude étant presque toujours le partage de l'homme, vous vous déterminerez très rarement, si vous attendez une démonstration. Cependant il faut prendre un parti: et il ne faut pas le prendre au hasard." (Uncertainty being nearly always the lot of man, one would seldom decide at all if one waited for a demonstration. Yet choose a part one must! and it is not necessary to act at random.) Butler enlarges on the same theme with ingenious (but very needless) particularity, and concludes in these striking words: "For numberless instances might be mentioned, respecting the common pursuits of life, where a man would be thought, in a liberal sense, distracted, who would not act, and with great application too, not only upon an even chance, but upon much less, and where the probability or chance was greatly against his succeeding." Most true; but did Butler seriously intend to say that a man would do well and honorably to avouch his belief in the church creed, amid every circumstance of solemnity, meaning no more than that he held the truth of it to be just barely possible? That is exactly what he says, and reiterates over and over again. The ludicrous inconsequence of this whole argumentation is very obvious, there being no parallelism between the cases; because the inquirer is never in the same sort of dilemma as the actor, for the good reason that three alternatives are always open to the former, but to the latter only two.

Whatever is proven we believe perforce; whatever is disproven we deny; all else is doubtful. Here is there no place left for even the smallest particle of faith. But otherwise, if, with Tertullian, we believe quia impossibile, then indeed will there be room for any quantity of faith. But this is not usual nowadays. Faith is no longer relied on as of yore, but is chiefly valued as an useful supplement to reason.

However, this compromise is trebly futile. For, firstly, how much faith should be supplemented to how much proof, in order to make up a certainty? Until that is answered, the principle can never be applied; but it never can be answered, because the two things have no common measure.

And, secondly, when faith and reason clash, which shall gain the mastery? If faith, then indeed are all reasoners driven from the field; for no arguments will avail against the man who will dispute the testimony of reason. But if reason, then clearly nothing can be known until it has been proven, for whatever has not been proven may sometime be disproven.

And, lastly, if it be said that true faith must always teach truth, and so right reason can never contradict it; still how shall we distinguish a true faith from a false? Arguments can be tested, but there is no way of testing faith either objectively or subjectively. Feeling is faith, and cannot test itself; and feeling equally governs conduct, be it right or wrong. The firmest of all believers and those most eager to die for their opinions are madmen.

The kind of reputation which Butler now enjoys is really ludicrous, considering that he himself (for he is scrupulously honest) did not claim to prove Christianity true; no, nor even that the truth of it would follow from the belief in God, but only that it was not more incredible than optimistic deism such as Bolingbroke's and Shaftesbury's. Butler passed over Job's perplexity, as well he might. That theme was long since exhausted in the books of Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Psalms, and St. Paul's Epistles, and slender consolation can be drawn therefrom. I much fear that some scholars read their Analogy as they read their Bible. It deserves better treatment.

A BOMB IN THE CAMP.

FORSYTH, Ga., May 31, 1879.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—The Index tract, "Impeachment of Christianity," circulated here, has created a commotion in the camps of the "faithful" like the explosion of a bomb in the sleeping camps of an army. The ministers of the various Christian churches are on the "war-path" now, and will deliver special discourses, in answer to your tract, in their churches to-morrow.

Great anxiety has been displayed by all classes to read the tract, and I have had several calls for it from those who had heard of it and did not get a copy in the first distribution. The Rev. Dr. Hillyer has, I am informed, addressed to you personally a reply to your tract by letter, and I hope you will take up the gauntlet thrown down by him, and carry the war into Africa. If his letter is not too long, publish it in THE INDEX and reply to it, and I will take pleasure in giving it a wide circulation. The people here want light and knowledge, and I believe a wide field for good is open here which the "Index Association" can make valuable use of.

I have just read in the last INDEX (of 29th May) Mr. Washburn's discourse on the "Christian Tragedy at Pocasset." If he never does anything else, he has done enough by that article to make himself famous, so able, clear, and overwhelming is his logic. That discourse you ought to publish in tract form and distribute by the thousands, like your tract, "The Impeachment of Christianity"; it is just what is needed, and, having the all-absorbing fact of this murder as a basis, will be more widely read than any arguments, however able, that are purely abstract and theoretical. Strike while the iron of public feeling is hot, with the sledge-hammer of Mr. Washburn's logic, and, my word for it, that discourse widely circulated will do much to dissipate the lethargy of our people, and open their eyes to the inevitable logical results of their religious opinions, and lead the way to a widespread awakening to the truths of other views than those under whose fallacious shadows the world has been so long slumbering.

The Reverend Doctor who has assumed the task of replying to you here is a good man in every sense of the word, and leads a pure life above reproach, and has only the stain of Christian religious bigotry upon his escutcheon. All ministers of this faith are necessarily either fanatics or hypocrites; that fanaticism, in the first case, resulting from implicit "faith," taught from infancy, in the truth of their absurd dogmas; or their hypocrisy, in the second, being caused by their knowledge, through the light of reason and common-sense, that, while professing to believe the doctrines they preach, they feel in their inner souls that they are false.

To the class of fanatics, then, belongs this venerable gentleman, whose whole life has been spent in "dealing out damnation round the land" from the pages of those ancient authors who, he verily believes, were inspired to be a medium of communication between the Creator and the created—just as if the way to God was not open to every man alike. Being a Baptist, he takes the most narrow and bigoted view of Christianity through the clouded glasses of Calvinism, election, etc., and sends to endless torments (in his sermons) all the vast millions of heathendom (so-called) who never heard of Christ, and are dying year by year only to add fuel to the flames of the Christian hell.

A man of considerable learning, his arguments have just sufficient scope and strength to set him up before these people as almost infallible, and hence the necessity of your giving his attacks on you more than a passing notice.

I hope to hear from you through the columns of the next INDEX.

Yours truly,

BASCOM MYRICK.

[We have as yet received no letter from Dr. Hillyer, but should cheerfully publish one from him, if courteously expressed.—Ed.]

SYMPATHY ACROSS THE BORDER.

MONTREAL, June 3, 1879.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

... You cannot imagine how deeply and passionately I have been interested in the noble stand which you have taken against the shameful and sophistical libertinism that recklessly or ignorantly defends the transmission of obscenity through the mails. When I read the account of the Syracuse disruption, and found that a majority of professed freethinkers showed no scruple in compromising the honor and purity of liberalism, I felt mortified; and I was inclined to consider that, after all, the stronghold of Orthodoxy, with all its grim and ghastly appointments, was a safer and more decent lodgment than the crazy structure—slimy and repulsive—in which our betrayers (I will not call them friends) took refuge. I prefer Comstock any day to any one of these smooth apologists of dirt. May every principle that constitutes the crown of manhood, everything that is beautiful and good and true throughout the universe, sustain and encourage you, and make you invincible in this conflict of right against wrong, of virtue against vice.

Your elucidation of the rights and limitations of individualism has settled certain notions in my mind which have been hitherto in a state of chaos.

The individualism that insists on illimitable freedom is sure to end in illimitable license. I have never lost sight of the fact, as some of my rationalistic friends have done, that the individualism which hardens into isolation is a horror and a curse.

I have felt the freezing influence of this social segregation, too common among men of advanced thought in Montreal, this apathy and aversion to organization, until I have sometimes doubted the wisdom that has rendered the churches—in our philosophy—temples of paganism rather than centres of social intercourse and aids to human happiness. Well, the thoughts of thinkers are in a transition state the world over, and I suppose a few generations more will hit upon the golden mean.

Your most sincere friend,

GEO. MARTIN.

GOODNESS.

Let us take, in place of the fraudulent and superstitious system called Christianity, the simple religion of Reason; namely, the worship of love for, faith in, and constant practice of pure goodness, so far as we are able from time to time to discern it, each one of us endeavoring, by the aid this Rational Religion affords, to achieve a blessed immortality for his or her own memory, and in that way, and that way only, hope to "live forever."

GEORGE NATHAN HILL.

THE JANITOR was as proud as a boy with a new pair of red mittens. Some kind soul in Hartford, Conn., had forwarded the clue a jaw-bone of a shark as a relic to hang on the walls, and he had fastened it up between the bear-trap and the coffee-mill, and placed under its sharp teeth the legend: "Don't bite off more'n you kin chew." "Gem'len," said Brother Gardner, as he pointed to the legend, "de languidge of dat motto am not elegant, but de words convey a heap of solid common-sense, an' we doan' hev to go down ober fo'teen feet to fin de moral. De man who bites off more'n he kin chew is gwine to git hisself in an embarrassin' s'ityouashun. De motto doan' apply atogedder to de eatin' of meat an' taters. It means dat de pussion who wants to fling on gorgeonsness hev got to hev de rocks right down in his pockets, or fall kerchunk in de road. It applies to de young man on a salary of $8 a week, who am courtin' a gal who kin use up $2 a day an' not half try. It applies to de man who finks he kin sell out a ward caucus and deliber de votes in a collar-box. It applies to de man who buys up delegates an' depends on de honest voters to push him frew. It applies to de chap who sails along de avenue wid de ideah in his head dat all business would suddenly stop, in case death took him away."—Detroit Free Press.

DURING the last year the American Bible Society has circulated about one million copies of the Bible, the British and Foreign Bible Society of Scotland thirty-six thousand, and other societies more than one million. The total circulation since the formation of these Bible societies has been eighty-two million by the British and Foreign, thirty-five million by the American, five million by the National Bible Society of Scotland, and by German societies eight million five hundred thousand, while the circulation of other societies has raised the total to about one hundred and sixty million copies of the Scriptures circulated in various tongues by Bible societies during the last seventy-five years.

SHE was trimming the lamps, and just as a wick dropped out of reach her mother heard her exclaim: "Oh, the Dickens!" "There, there, my child! Why will you indulge in such expressions?" Then she fingered for the lost wick, and exclaimed: "Why, ma, isn't that a natural suggestion of Pickwick?"

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1879, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

LIBERAL LEAGUE PLATFORM For the Presidential Election of 1880, ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification for any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

SIFTINGS.

"WISDOM," it has been said, "is like the heiress of the novel, who is at first courted only for her wealth, but whom the fortune-hunter learns afterwards to love for herself alone."

THE DISCUSSION on the Pocasset Tragedy, by L. K. Washburn, recently published in THE INDEX, has been put into tract form, and may be had by addressing L. K. Washburn, Revere, Mass. Price 5 cents.

IT SEEMS that Dr. Döllinger has refused the overtures of Leo XIII. to return to Rome, the rumors to the contrary notwithstanding. When informed that "There is a new pope in the Vatican," Döllinger replied: "Ah yes, a new pope, but the old papacy!"

THE REV. JOHN CHADWICK thinks that "If Freeman could have worked ten hours a day and had good food and a set of Dickens' or Waverley Novels to read the Bible with, gone less to prayer-meetings and more to plays and dances, he would not have thought of choosing for his model an Arab sheik who, if he ever lived, died several thousand years ago."

IT IS ASTONISHING how things get turned round in this world. A society has been formed in New York of moderate drinkers, for the avowed purpose of promoting temperance. The moderate drinker has been regarded one of the principal obstacles to the progress of the temperance reform; and we confess that we are still old-fashioned enough to believe that the moderate stands the first chance of becoming an immoderate one.

THE NEW LAW permitting women to vote on school boards in Boston requires that the voter shall be a tax-payer and registered in her husband's name. Mrs. Lucy Stone Blackwell objects to the latter qualification, and hence was denied the privilege of such registration a few days since. While we recognize the justice of the stand which Mrs. Blackwell takes, we regret exceedingly that one so eminently fitted for the fullest exercise of the elective franchise should be deprived of it through this flimsy restriction.

INTERESTING EXERCISES were held by the Sunday-school of the Parker Memorial Society of this city, in memory of Mr. Garrison, on the Sunday succeeding his decease. Addresses were given by J. M. Buffum of Lynn and Robert J. Wolcott, life-long friends and co-laborers of Mr. Garrison, and by Sidney Morse, F. H. Hinckley, and others. In the course of his remarks Mr. Buffum said that in the abolition days he was generally referred to as "Nigger Buffum," but now his townspeople seemed eager to bestow upon him any honor in the gift of the community. Mr. Buffum is at present serving a third term as mayor of the city of Lynn. Similar exercises to the above were conducted by the Sunday-school of the Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass.

AN ORGANIZATION has recently been effected at Seymour, Indiana, with the following bond of membership: "Declaration. We, the undersigned, in order to promote investigation, to search out truth, to dissipate error and superstition, and also the better to promote the well-being of ourselves, our fellows, and the creatures about us, organize into a society to be called The Southern Indiana Association of Humanitarians and Freethinkers. Articles of Association: 1. The object of this Association is to do good, to search for and reveal truth, and to unmask error, to do good to every creature, to search for truth everywhere, to unmask error in whatever disguise it may be found. 2. Any person of good moral character who is willing to investigate, and listen and yield to reason, is eligible to membership." About fifty names are appended to this "declaration," which gives the enterprise a vigorous and hopeful beginning.

THE METHODIST ministers were in a good deal of a dilemma at their Monday meeting in Boston, after the death of Mr. Garrison, as to how to act in respect to the event. It was, of course, impossible not to make some reference to one who, even while living, had been crowned in so large a degree with a due meed of honor and reverence for his disinterested labors. At length, after a protracted debate, it was decided by a vote of an almost equal division to yield the points of objection, and concede to him the title of a Christian. The question naturally arises, If he were not a Christian, would it be worth while to try to be one? When Wilberforce, the great English anti-slavery reformer, was asked what he had been doing for the salvation of his soul while pursuing his labors for the slave, he replied that he had been so absorbed in serving the slave that he had almost forgotten he had a soul to save. Perhaps if Garrison had thought more of his soul and less of the slave he might have been as good a Christian as those who now sit in judgment upon him.

IT IS ANNOUNCED that twelve Indians have arrived at Lee, Mass., from the Hampton Institute, Virginia, to be educated. We confess we have not great faith in efforts to impart the higher education to our aborigines. It does not seem a very practical undertaking to try to make them gentlemen and scholars. We are aware that very encouraging results are reported in this direction. But it seems to us, nevertheless, that the most urgent need in respect to them at present is elementary instruction in civilization, in farming, handicraft, and rudimentary knowledge. They need persons to go among them, not to convert them to any sectarian faith, but for these simple missionary labors. Then they need protection from swindling government contractors and traders, and especially from the traffic among them in whiskey and tobacco,—in fact, the various forms of vice and immorality to which they have been too long exposed. And above all they need removal from contiguous relation to a body of men whose chief business and pride in life is to slay human beings, and who are, beyond doubt, in no small degree accountable for the misdeeds of these untutored people.

THE CALL of the Rev. Robert Collyer to New York is an event of considerable interest to church-goers in that city. The fortunes of the society over which he will be settled have been somewhat peculiar. Two of its ministers went back on it in succession. The Rev. Dr. Osgood, during whose pastorate the present elegant church-edifice was built, after twenty-five years as a Unitarian minister,—quite long enough it might have been supposed to become confirmed in his position,—suddenly slipped Unitarian simplicity for Episcopalian robes and "holy orders." The Rev. Mr. Hepworth chose Congregationalism. The Rev. W. R. Alger, an elegant rhetorician now of Denver, Col., was, for two or three years, its next preacher. The church has long been burdened with an enormous debt which has recently been lifted, rendering its prospect in this respect much better. It is not likely to become alarmingly radical under any circumstances. Its antecedents tend to ally it with the conservative wing of the denomination; and Mr. Collyer has passed the period of life when he is likely to undergo any marked intellectual transition. He is in pretty nearly equal favor with both extremes of Unitarianism. Indeed, he belongs to that large class of ministers in the Christian Church at the present time who have got entirely outside of their logical connections without being aware of it. But in any event, so long as there are church-going people and preachers, we congratulate the society that has the good fortune to possess the gifted ministrations of the broad and genial nature and the bright and eloquent genius of Robert Collyer.

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N. Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

BEFORE THE SOCIETY OF ETHICAL CULTURE, NEW YORK, MAY 11, 1879.

BY FELIX ADLER, PH.D.

And so the year's end has come. Now do the breezes of spring blow around us! Now does Nature spread once more her rich carpet in grove and field! Now do the white and golden blossoms appear upon the trees! The graceful willows wave their branches to us, and soon the voice of the nightingale will be heard melodious in the bushes. "Away, away!" cries the soul, "into fresh, green Nature." There are the proper surroundings amid which to recuperate the faded strength. There the faded brain will drink in new sap, new vigor. There you will listen to mightier ethical preachings than ever fell from the lips of man—the sermon of the stars and of the mountains and of the storms. There, if you wish to practise religion, you may mingle your voices with the voices of the cataract and of the rivers and of the booming surges of the boundless sea, as they rise together to magnify and praise the grandeur of the universe.

We have deemed it necessary to suspend the exercises of this society during a considerable portion of the year,—not that the practical relief-work of our society will on that account suffer or come to a stand-still; all through the heated season, our district nurse who is now going the rounds of the homes of the poor, striving to alleviate pain, to combat foulness, and to beat off death from the bedside of the sick, will continue to proceed upon her errand of mercy and charity. All through the year, with the exception only of a brief spell when the intense and almost torrid sun glares upon the streets of this sweltering city, our kindergarten will keep open its doors and gather its merry troops of happy children that make its halls so pleasant a resort. But the ordinary exercises of our society must be suspended.

We do not come hither as many persons go to their churches, holding the mere act of going to be meritorious, believing that this will ingratiate them with the Deity, thinking that, as a visit to the house of an acquaintance is considered a mark of attention and is well received, so that a visit to the house of God is considered a mark of attention and is recorded in favor of the visitor in the great account-book. We come hither solely for the purpose of gaining certain mutual benefits; we wish to contemplate in common certain great problems; we wish to take in common resolutions for the higher life; we wish to feel, each of us, that inspiration which comes to the individual soul from the sense of being united with others in the effort to realize some exalted purpose. To this end, the latter part of the fall, the winter, the opening spring suffice; this period of time is sufficient for the hearers,—it is more than sufficient for the speaker. If at least he is to be a constant learner, if he is to constantly extend his knowledge, to reconsider from time to time his opinions, to deepen and solidify his convictions,—if in this sense he is to be a constant learner (and only one who is this can be a true teacher).—then it is imperatively necessary that a season of protracted rest be granted him in which he may ward off the intrusions and the invasions of the world and consecrate a happy and longed-for leisure to the task of inward growth and spiritual renovation.

The fact that this release is not commonly granted to the ministers of the churches is one reason, among others, why we find that so many of them are utterly exhausted in body before they have reached the middle stage of life, and their nerves unstrung, and why even those who begin their career with considerable intellectual ability become in the course of time shallow, feeding upon themselves for want of replenishing nourishment from without; and such essence of thought as remains in their utterances is too often diluted in a flood of watery phraseology.

We need, therefore, a pause, and on this account to-day will be the last Sunday of our year's meetings. It is the last Sunday also, friends, which we shall spend together in Standard Hall; and the fact that this is so recalls to my mind reminiscences which you will pardon me for lingering over a moment before we separate.

When we first began to collect in this hall, the prospects were by no means certain, the difficulties were by no means small. Here was a new principle wishing to strike root in American soil; here was a new mode of emotional life which offered itself to the acceptance of men. Mark you, the design was of the broadest, the ambition bold; some thought it bordered on the verge of audacity. It was not a new sect we wished to found, not a new society we wished to add to other societies; but we were upborne by the conviction that not since the year one of our era, not since eighteen hundred years ago when Christianity was born, has there been so important a turning-point in the affairs of men as there is in this generation. We believe that a revolution, though a peaceable one, is being consummated. We saw that science has effectually changed the basis of life; and, while few men have truly and honestly confessed to themselves whither science would lead, we wanted now and here to make the experiment, to go the whole length of science, to accept it all, because science alone can guarantee proof; and then, but then, to consider the emotional life also, to ask how, upon this new basis of existence, we can satisfy our emotional needs. The problem was, how to reconcile once more the heart and head of society that are at variance; how, if possible, to give once more peace to the passion-hunted and doubt-distracted souls of modern men.

How, then, was the soil prepared for such an experiment? There were difficulties at the very outset—this we could clearly see. In the first place, there was the difficulty of inertia. People do not want to think. It is so pleasant to move in a smooth, worn rut, they do not wish to be disturbed. Thinking necessitates exertion. What if we could prove that the truth is on our side? They say, "We care not for your uncomfortable truths; away with them!"

Closely allied with this power of inertia was the power of superstition, the fear, the dread, the mental prostration in an idolatrous worship. Religion is the fear of the infinite; superstition is the fear of the indefinite, of the merely mysterious. It deals with omens, with auguries, with all that is mystic in life, in acts, in institutions. Superstition opposed each new innovation, and would oppose ours.

Behold with what cruel glee superstition looks on when there is sickness in the family of the heretic! It says, "Ah, this is the punishment from God, and now do you feel his power whom you have dared to slight? He will slay your wife, your child, your friend, to punish your offence." Oh, what a cruel God is the God of superstition! If a ship sinks in which there is one infidel and five hundred others, they will say, "Because of this infidel, the ship sank;" though that, forsooth, is a clumsy God who must kill five hundred to reach one that has offended.

Then there was added to this a third obstacle; namely, that of false independence. I do not deprecate independence and its value; I stated only in my last address how important is its office in the modern world; how, when we have mines underneath the fortress of superstition, this independence of the modern world is the explosive which will send the fortresses into the air; how it breaks the shackles of ecclesiasticism; how it will eventually teach men to do away with a privileged class in religion, as well as in politics. But it is the false independence to which I allude. To bow to a man of rank because he has power, to cringe to a man of wealth because he has riches, is infamy; but to bend to a man of superior moral qualities, is what we call reverence. Reverence means to bend to superior moral qualities; and that does not degrade a man, if he bends not to the person, but to the greatness that is in that person, and is himself raised and refined and ennobled in the aspect of that excellence which he truly admires.

But the spirit of the modern age is irreverent; the democratic age will tolerate nothing greater—no, no, nor the thought of aught that is greater—than itself. The democratic age, in consequence, is intolerant of leadership. Each individual will go his own course stubbornly, stolidly, will not unite with others for a common purpose; and this was the danger. These men who know all, who say they can learn nothing in religion,—these were the great obstacles to advancement, these over-wise people who have not even charity enough to give a part of their surplus wisdom to poor tyros who, like ourselves, confess in all sincerity that we know very little and would be grateful for a little more.

But if these three were the obstacles,—inertia, superstition, individualism,—it would be ungrateful not to mention also the helps. Our great help in looking over the world around us is the sense of truthfulness among the people, which has never been so highly developed as at the present day. There is a certain tone in the voice, there is a certain expression of mien, which cannot be feigned. So men confess their truthfulness or their falsehood unwittingly; and so institutions and acts and systems confess their falsehood or their truth to the people. The people dimly appreciate what they do not understand. They dimly feel that the present religions, with their ancient tales of the patriarchs and the exodus and the miracles that were worked two thousand years ago, do not appeal to their own life. The people feel that the churches have become herbariums with dried flowers; they want to go out into living gardens and see the living flowers and taste their sweetness. They see that the churches have become museums with fossil remains of ancient religions; they wish to feel life and to have the living needs that are in their own hearts answered by living thoughts, by living men, by living institutions; and when there is even the faintest, feeblest effort to supply their needs, the people rise to the occasion and are grateful for what they receive.

Then the second great help is the concern of the more educated for the moral welfare of their children. The ethical school is the basis, the cornerstone of our society; it must be the corner-stone of every liberal society that would live. This is a firm cement to make us cohere, that we labor together for the welfare of the children; that we strive to secure their full and free moral development; that we teach them nothing which they must ever unlearn; that we strive to educate them in harmony with the convictions of their parents; that we undertake to transmit to them unimpaired the best possessions, the highest thought, the noblest sentiments of this age as a precious legacy unto the next.

It is a universal task which we assume; it does not concern you, a handful of men and women; it does not concern New York; it does not concern the United States; it concerns the universe and the ages. And yet, great as the task is, cheering as is the encouragement from every side, we could never have entered upon such a task, so honeycombed is it with difficulties and vexations, public and secret, had it not been for one conviction, one overmastering conviction,—this, namely, that failure is—I will not say improbable, no, but impossible; that there is no such word as fail for us.

If I say that, I am not insane enough to mean us, the individuals. I know very well the momentum of the opposing forces. I know it is very possible that we, like countless others, may be ground into the dust, may be crushed out into nothingness. And yet we cannot fail; for it is the cause that will live, and we may and must live only as we live in that cause; and in its triumph, therefore, we also triumph. Let no one come to devote himself to the sacred service of reform hoping success. He who comes to achieve his own interests, to enhance his own desires, let him turn to the professions; let him seek to live by gain; let him do as others do: let him not dare to bring profane fire to the altar. Away with these false priests! He only who is prepared to accept failure for himself, he only who sees the possibility and is ready to meet the eventuality of defeat in his own person,—he alone cannot be defeated; for he sees the final victory beyond his defeat.

The poet Schiller has said that whenever any one has taken a new direction toward a new goal, he does already enjoy by anticipation the fruition of his aims; for he knows that a new direction has now been taken, and that every step henceforth must be a step toward that goal, and it is to him as if the goal were reached.

Now, considering the immensity of the task and the brevity of the years that are allotted to us makes every worker in this cause filled with the desire to labor, filled with a tireless, restless diligence that he may achieve at least a part, a little part, of the work appointed, before the night sets in and the darkness cometh in which no man can work.

Let us then, now, in accordance with the custom of these occasions, skim briefly over the work of the past years, to discover whether anything of clearer thought, of higher inspiration, and of more confident and joyful trust we have gained, and allude passing to a few of the leading themes of discussion that have engaged our attention during the past seven months.

In the first year of our existence as a society, we drew the rough outlines of our position, but laid stress chiefly on that which we do not want—creed—thinking that the time has gone by for dogmatic religions. In the second year we began to apply the standard of ethics as we understood it to some of the great practical problems of the age, and laid the foundations of our relief work, to which additions have since been made during the past year. Without at all neglecting, let me hope, any of these matters, we have concentrated our attention chiefly upon an analysis of conscience and the desire to find brief, terse, clear-cut statements for the chief duties of life; starting from the proposition that then only is the conduct of life secure when it is founded on rules, and that those rules are only secure when they are deduced from principles, and that those principles are only effective when they are organized into a system.

We began, therefore, with a criticism of the theological basis of morality. We held that the theological basis of morality is philosophically untenable and historically untrue. Untenable, because, if you perform a virtuous act in the hope of reward or from the dread of punishment, or even in the spirit of obedience to the will of an all-powerful God, the virtuous quality escapes from your action, since this alone is a true principle,—that right for the right's sake makes right right. Historically, the theological basis of morals is untrue, because it is not to be found in history, not to be confirmed by facts, which prove that men have changed the moral dictates according to the imagined character of the God who issued them. The commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," or, as we have ventured to amend it, "even better than thyself,"—this commandment, whether taught by the religion of America or of Judea of Hindoostan or of China, appeals equally to the human heart, is equally acceptable to every sane mind, to every generous soul. Nay, we judge the gods themselves to be true or false, according as they conform to or violate our human standard of morality.

We call him a false God who, in the last chapter of Leviticus, demands human sacrifice; we call him an outrageous God who, in the last chapter of Samuel, demands that the sons of Saul shall be slain in his honor on Mount Gilboa; we call him a tyrannous God who prefers the men who bring incense to his altars, though unrighteous, to those who have too much self-respect to join these rites, though righteous.

This, then, is established,—that the moral standard maintains its priority; we judge all religions by it, and God himself is called God, as I have put it, because he is good, not, conversely, that good is good because it is of God.

We next proceeded to discuss some of the great ethical theories; and chiefly utilitarianism did we assail, because we believe that that system of morals is dangerous, since it flatters the vanity of the young by offering them a specious explanation of questions both deep and difficult,—since it saps the moral enthusiasm which should grace the age of youth,—since it encourages selfishness, and the power of selfishness is strong and stubborn enough in human nature without such encouragement. The duty of all ethics and of all religion should be to curb, to bridle, to wrestle with, and, if possible, throw this gigantic egotism of human nature; but here comes a system which tells us that our very "holy of holies" is the throne, the dominion of egotism; that the noblest emotions of our human souls are but the stirrings of the old selfishness; that the sting, the serpent's sting, the anti-christ, egotism, is in our very hearts; and that the very angels that peep out of the windows of our soul are but demons in disguise.

Now this we could not credit. Utilitarianism says that all virtue is the pursuit of pleasure. But evidently there is a variety of pleasures; and how shall we choose? Utilitarianism says, in the person of John Stuart Mill, that we shall choose the higher pleasures in preference to the lower. But I ask, then, What are higher pleasures? what are lower pleasures? Evidently, if pleasure is to be the criterion, higher can only mean more pleasure-giving,—lower, less pleasure-giving.

But here is a contradiction to the facts. It is not true that what we call the higher life is more pleasure-giving; on the contrary, it is often more pain-giving. Long is the way and steep the path and sharp the thorns that tear and lacerate. Is not, I ask, the sensualist's position correct, if pleasure is the foundation of virtue? He says: "I care not for your neutral tints of respectability, prolonged through many years,—I want a brief but complete pleasure. Give me one long, deep draught from the chalice of pleasure; give me festivals and wines and roses; give me to forget myself in the wild 'Walpurgis nacht' of the passions; and then, when my body is wasted, when my sustenance is gone, I will throw life from me like a sucked orange. What care I? A reckless, riotous life, and a quick end."

Do you not see that, with pleasure for your standard, you cannot compel the epicurean to acknowledge virtue? Do you not see that the word ought escapes from your language? Do you not see that there is no more any such thing as crime, but only a mistaken calculation, an unenlightened self-interest? Yet in very truth all the inward voices cry out that there is such a thing as crime, and that we may become criminals; and all the horrors of remorse warn us that there is a responsibility in the human heart that holds our feelings as in a vice, that there is a law upon us which will not let us go, struggle how we may, and from which no sophism can let us escape.

We discussed a second theory of ethics,—that which bases all morality on sympathy. We value sympathy; it is a lever in the hand of principle, but of itself powerless; it may be used for good or ill, to the benefit or the detriment of those in whose behalf it is employed. We found that sympathy is capricious, changeful; we found that it values the present pain,—that it is magnetic to the present pain. We found that it is out of proportion to facts, and for this very reason cannot be a standard, a principle. We found that we have more sympathy with the slightest suffering in our immediate vicinity, with the headache or the toothache of a friend, than with the accumulated woes and calamities of an empire,—the famine in distant China, for instance. We found,—and this chiefly,—that the most sympathetic men, who would not hurt a dog, who would not tread upon a worm, who would shrink from the infliction of pain with horror, men who are members of societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals, men who in their lives have never been guilty of a hurtful act,—these very men are willing to indulge the vice that gives joy, willing to inflict a lasting injury upon another, if that injury be accompanied by a momentary joy.

We found that sympathy is no safeguard against the delights of vice, because it becomes their advocate rather than, as it should be, their accuser and their judge.

Then, briefly, we laid down our own principle of virtue, and we found it to be the idea of law. We abandoned the old terms of "selfish" and "unselfish," around which ethical controversies are waged; we found that they do not go to the heart of the problem. We found that it is possible to perform a self-regarding act which shall be highly commendable, and we found it also possible to perform actions which tend to the benefit of others which ought to be visited with the severest condemnation. We found that perfection expressed the true end of the moral commandment; that to perfect the human soul, whether in ourselves or others, expresses the end of all moral endeavor; that no one can perfect himself without serving humanity, that no one can serve humanity without perfecting himself. We found that the highest development of intellect, feeling, and will, that the realization of the right and the bright and the true in utmost harmony,—that this expressed the ideal of all ethics. We found that the law of righteousness is merely another expression for the law of reason; the highest expression of reason is righteousness. Further, since reason is not only in the mind but founded also outside the mind in the nature of things,—since the laws of Nature attest the reasonableness of Nature,—therefore, if right and reason be at the core one, it follows that right also is founded in the nature of things, a part of the eternal order of the universe. And this is the rock of certainty to which we would fasten the cables of the new religion.

Having laid down the fundamental principle, we proceeded to discuss the several duties of life, according to their chief subdivisions; namely, the duties which a man owes to himself and the duties which one owes to another.

Among the first duties I will refer here, briefly, only to the duty of truthfulness. We called truthfulness an act of moral self-preservation; and yet with a sinking heart we were obliged to confess that perfect truthfulness is impossible to man. We defined that to keep a promise is to make facts conform with words; that to seek the truth is to make words conform to facts. And we found that the utmost sincerity is not always possible. There are cases in which, for the sake of a deeper truth, an essential veracity, we must sacrifice literal veracity; not that the moral law itself is self-contradictory (the moral law is throughout harmonious in itself), but it was capable of complete realization only in an ideal community, being itself an ideal law. Sufficient for us that it points the way; enough for us that we at least strive to reach out toward the deeper truthfulness of human nature; enough for us that we penetrate through night and fog toward that goal to which we must ever steer, even though we may never reach it.

Now we arrive at that chapter of ethics which treats of the duties which man owes to others; and among these duties it was the duty of philanthropy which chiefly arrested our attention. In connection with this duty of philanthropy, it was the social question that again came up for consideration.

The religion of to-day, friends, has lost the certainty as well as the dread of the hereafter; the religion of to-day has become in consequence more downright, more direct; it deals with practical questions. Questions of industry, of property, of finance, of taxation, become religious questions according to the new view; and so the "social question" also became a religious question. There were many who thought that this ought not to be the case, who desired that the "social question" be excluded, this apple of discord be removed from public discussion; but this was impossible. The word "social reform"—a bugbear to many—means naught else than real reform. And what is radical religion, if not that which goes to the root of things,—hence also to the root of evils,—and exposes their wrongs, and fearlessly tells the people how wrong should be righted?

The social question is preëminently, therefore, a religious question of to-day; it must be met by any religion that desires to live. Yet, since there are so many gross misunderstandings, foolish, absurd prejudices touching this matter, we deemed it right to lay down, in the first instance, what we wished to preserve amid all the changes that are possible hereafter; and there were three things that we wish to preserve.

In the first place, culture, the highest intellectual culture. There are some demagogues who declaim against high culture, against exclusive specialism, against the aristocracy of the learned. But these I stigmatize as foes rather than as friends to the people. For no one is so deeply interested in high culture, in exclusive specialism, as the people themselves. No one derives such direct benefit from the aristocracy of learning as the multitude. Here is the plain syllogism: exclusive specialism alone leads to simple results; the people understand none but simple results; therefore it follows that the people are highly interested in exclusive specialism. But even if this were not the case, if they derived no special advantage from the work of the scholars in their libraries, in their students' closets, at their professors' desks,—even if this were not the case, we should still insist on laying the heaviest sacrifices for high culture. Every rose is glorified if there is anywhere a perfect rose; every individual human being is exalted if there be anywhere on earth more perfect men. If there were a thousand persons and wealth enough to support them all in comfort, I should be willing that nine hundred and ninety should work harder,—I should even insist that some of those nine hundred and ninety might be poor,—in order that ten men might be set apart to do nothing at all with their hands,—only to think, to live for science and for art.

Not only intellectual culture is of the highest importance, but also manners. Fine manners we would see preserved. They are a fruit which grows only upon the soil of culture. Manners are to character what the flavor is to the fruit, what the perfume is to the flower. Manners are the grace and the glory of life.

And, thirdly, personal liberty we would see preserved,—that which our coarse demagogues of to-day, however, do so seriously impair, that which the radical communism of the day would so utterly extinguish. Personal liberty, we must protest, must remain amid all changes.

But after we had thus briefly indicated the conservative element of our theory, after we had shown what we wish to be conserved or preserved amid all the changes, it became necessary, also, to show the changes that must be made in theories, in institutions, in practice, and in the ideas of the people; chiefly, however, for leading the practice. Here, then, there were a number of fallacies which we attacked. In the first place, the great pernicious fallacy that the luxury of the rich tends to the advantage of the poor. There is no more self-denial needed, according to this convenient theory; you need not give all that you have for the poor to alleviate their distress. No. But you shall be as extravagant as you please, and then lay also the flattering unction to your souls that you have been at the same time the greatest benefactor to the race. Now this is a very hollow sophism, and the argument we have used against it was briefly this:—

There are two persons: one expends a thousand dollars on garments and furniture; another expends a thousand dollars on champagne. Now it is true they have both given employment to labor, but the difference is this: That, while in the one case a product remains, in the other case no product remains; that, while in the one case the garments and the furniture go out among the many and are enjoyed by them, in the other case the champagne is quaffed by the few; that, while in the one case these garments and furniture go out and remain a capital fund to support labor while it reproduces its original outlay, in the other case—in the case of the wine—there is only so much capital lost, so much of the material fund of society wiped out.

Now I do not protest against luxury on its own account. There are certain kinds of luxury which are perfectly legitimate. The political economist calls all that "useful expenditure" when material strength is invested and material strength is reproduced, and all that "luxury" when material strength is invested and material strength is not reproduced. But now it is possible that material strength may be invested and translated into spiritual strength; and that is a kind of luxury which we most earnestly, which we most profoundly, desire. Here, then, you have a safe standard for every mode of expenditure, both public and private: that which conduces, that which contributes, to your material or to your spiritual strength is allowable; but that which contributes only to vanity or love of display, that which is frivolous expenditure,—that is not allowable under any system of morals, and on that rest the deep and damning curses of the poor.

Then there was the second fallacy against which we contended,—when they say that labor and capital are equal, that they are equal parties to a contract. We show that they are not equal. In the first place, because the capitalist can wait and the laborer cannot wait; because too long a delay in the one instance costs the capitalist his profits, but too long a delay in the other instance costs the laborer his life. In the second place, they are not equal, because of the nobility of capital and the immobility of labor.

Then I contended against another fallacy,—that of the American principle of self-help and its efficiency. Self-help is an excellent thing so far as it goes; but it needs to be supplemented by a broader and nobler and more generous principle. You know that sometimes there is a rush of blood to the brain,—there is a congestion of blood to the brain. So now there is a congestion of labor to the towns, which are the brains of the country. We need to draw away labor from the towns, or else we shall have convulsion,—that is, revolution.

Now there exists in the neighborhood of the factories an army of starvation. This army of starvation is not an accident: it is a result of our industrial system. Expansion and contraction alternate in this industrial system.

With every expansion, thousands of laborers are drawn into employment; with every contraction of labor, thousands of laborers and their families are cast out by the industrial machine to lie by the roadside,—yes, and to rot by the roadside, if men's hearts were not better than their political economy.

We must protest against this political economy; we must grapple with this system of "let alone," of laissez faire, as they call it, and show it to be the heinous crime against humanity that it is, and we must supply a permanent escape-valve for our cities; we must found great colonization societies, to take away the great surplus of labor from our towns as soon as it becomes surplus, and to distribute it over the new lands of our country which wait for development and will repay the expenditure. It is a cheering sign that, since I last discoursed before you on this subject, the beginnings of a colonization society such as this have been made, a society has been formed.

There was another fallacy against which I contended,—that labor is free. I showed the evil of lack of time, of leisure which is essential to keep a human being human. I told you that, as they give all to their machines to make them go, so some great capitalists in this century have given living humanity to their machines—and oh the inhumanity of such a gift!—to make their machines go. I called to your attention the meeting held in 1860 in the town of Nottingham, to consider the misery of the lace-makers and to protest that the hours of labor should be reduced to eighteen out of twenty-four. I called to your attention certain facts: people rebelled against these facts; but I did not make the facts. In one sense they are right; the very paper should not have endured it, that such facts, such ugly, shameful facts, such a disgrace to humanity, should be printed on it. And yet the facts are there, inscribed on the official records, and I did but read what I found. I told you of those little children of nine years made to labor thirty-six hours consecutively by their task-masters, and forty-eight hours consecutively by their task-masters. I told you that as late as the year 1870 children three and one-half years old were employed in the brick yards, and when I mentioned the case of one little lad who himself weighed only fifty-two pounds, forced to carry forty-three pounds of clay seven miles every day and to walk seven other miles to assume his burden,—I wanted to tear the disguises away, I wanted to show you to what egotism leads, I wanted to make plain how the religion of the day has failed, I wanted to demonstrate how necessary it is that a new religious movement should inspire men's hearts to conquer that foe of egotism.

Then there were other topics which we discussed in two discourses,—the future of Judaism. We spoke of its possible renovation, if the right man should come to take up the work where Isaiah had left it off; but we said, so far as we are concerned, we stand outside the pale of all positive religions, and we have a totally different mission to perform. The great practical problems of the day absorb us wholly, and all who will join us in these problems shall be our brothers, and all who will gather around the banner of the new righteousness shall be called the new "chosen people." Yes, chosen for larger duties, for purer lives, for greater sacrifices; and every city in which this banner shall be raised and the people flock around it shall be called the "New Jerusalem" greater than the old. The whole wide earth once again shall be thrilled by the animating hope that will be ours, and at last our promised land shall be filled with milk and honey, as was the promised land of old,—with the milk of human kindness, with the honey-sweetness of precious human love.

We spoke briefly of the principles of religion, of theism and atheism,—what it is, what it is not.

We spoke of the consolations of our religion. We showed to the world that our religion is not a "fair-weather friend" only, but that it stands by us in the hour of supreme distress, and in our deadliest woes helps us. This is the rare quality of its consolation, that it calls the sufferer to action and thus helps him over his mere suffering; that it points out to him the great world of human sorrow around him, and says, "Go thither, ease their sufferings, detach your feelings from your own private loss," that it causes the passion of our griefs to melt in the pure flood of compassion.

And lastly we spoke of the missionary work of our religion; spoke of the golden opportunities in the great Western land whose destiny has but begun to be realized; spoke of the necessity of a journal to disseminate our views; spoke of the necessity of a school for the science of religion, as we have schools for the science of medicine, and schools for the science of law, in order to educate the educators, in order to train the leaders who will be raised up upon that broad and ample pattern which I sketched to you in my last discourse,—to be the students of history, to be versed in philosophy, to be specialists in charity, to be artists of the ideal. I pointed out to you that our religion still calls to arms; that we must fight; that there is no such thing yet for us as peace (people cry "Peace, peace," when there is no peace for us); that the issues must not be warped, must not be blurred, but must be made more distinct, must be made more pregnant; that we must not rest on our arms until every sham is laid low, until the glory of falsehood is levelled in the dust; that we are to be, if anything, the new church of humanity, an ecclesia militans, a soldier church.

Thus we sketched in different directions, mapped out before us, our large work; and now there must be a pause. It is time to end. The brief summary which I have given you to-day will recall in the minds of those who have been with us in our work to some extent the tasks which we have been able to touch upon; it will give to those who have not been with us in our work at least the direction of our labors. Very scant have been the results, very meagre compared with the immensity of the task; and yet as an earnest of the infinite things we hope for, may they not prove utterly worthless!

The year which closes to-day has been for us a prosperous one. Many friends have come to us, friends who were not sought or solicited, who have been attracted merely by the likeness of aim and inspiration and the source of interest; and this has been a strength and an encouragement to us, and we consider it and count it a privilege to have them with us.

The year has been a prosperous one to us. The hand of the "pale king of terrors" has spared us; that shadowy hand has stricken no name from the list of our members; but two children of our members have been taken away, two little buds nipped before their bloom, two little hearts stilled before they had tasted the little sweetness and much bitterness of mortal existence. The May month, which brings life and freshness into the houses of the living, will make green their graves also, and will cause the lilies to grow where they sleep their hushed baby-slumbers in the silent city of the dead. Greetings to the dead we whisper, messages of undying love to them in their still abodes, and renew ever again their unforgettable memories in this season of Nature's renewal.

And yet the memory of the dead ever calls us back with a new force into the walks and activities of life, stirring us, as a clarion note sounds the warning. Yet a little, and we too shall pass away; yet a little, and we too shall be with them; yet a little, and the day orb of our life also shall be quenched. Let us then truly live while we live on earth, and leave behind us that which will not perish.

Therefore do we so cling to this society of ours, because it leads us to infinite aims, because it gives an expanse and liberty to our energies such as no church, no synagogue, no temple has ever given. And therefore also, friends, if we feel that it is to be to us an instrument of incalculable good, therefore also let us love our society, let us rejoice that it was permitted to us to witness this third anniversary day. Let us believe in our star, and trust that it is victory which it prophesies to us. And let us return in the opening fall with larger zeal for the larger work of the glorious years that are to come!

JOHN HALL ON MODERN INFIDELITY.

THE OUTLOOK OF CHRISTIANITY.—VIEWS OF AN EMINENT PRESBYTERIAN CLERGYMAN.

There has been much discussion of late in respect to the prospect of Christianity in its conflict with modern tendencies. It has become a theme of frequent appearance in popular magazines and newspapers. It cannot fail, therefore, to be of interest to know the views of those who are most at home in the sphere to which the subject belongs; whose life pursuits render them, to a considerable extent, an authority in regard to such inquiries.

One of our reporters, a few days since, called upon a distinguished clergyman of this city, the Rev. Dr. John Hall, for this purpose.

As a preacher and theologian Dr. Hall occupies a foremost place in his own religious body and among the clergy of the country. No one could be chosen better qualified for a representative and exponent of the present status of the Evangelical Church to voice its hopes and fears. The conversation ran as follows:

"It is known to you, Doctor, that there appears to be something like a feeling of distrust in these latter days in respect to the progress of Christianity. It is predicted, even, by some, you are aware, that it is destined, soon or later, to be superseded by other modes of life and thought. I should like to ask how you regard the situation. Is there any real ground for such apprehensions as I have indicated on the part of Christian people? I suppose you have no esoteric convictions as to the subject—none that you wish to conceal or are unwilling to make public?"

"If you desire to know my views in respect to modern infidelity, I can tell them very quickly. I do not hesitate to say I have no respect for it whatever. I regard it but as the shallowest pretension, so far as it attempts to compete with or set up superior claims to the divine revelation of Christianity."

"Do you not think that Christianity is more imperilled through the rationalistic influences of the present than those of any former period?"

"No. The Church has always had to contend with infidelity. Every age has its particular form. The infidelity of the present is simply that which the circumstances of the time cause it to assume."

"Does it not strike deeper in our time, more directly at the fundamental doctrines of Christian faith on which the Church has been built?"

"In what way?"

"Particularly through the influence of science."

"The claims of science are much greater than can be verified. The positions of Huxley are only the old crude arguments of Hume revived."

"Would you say the same of Tyndall and Spencer?"

"Oh, Tyndall is a lecturer—a popularizer of science. Much of his reputation is due to this fact. This is also true of most of the other leading opponents of Christianity of the day. They are prominently before the public as writers and speakers, which tends to give an undue importance to their statements and opinions."

"Then you would say there is no reason for serious alarm to the friends of Christianity from the influence of such persons?"

"No; because it is counterbalanced by that of equal reputation as scientists, as, for example, Professor Guyot, Dana, Principal Dawson, and others."

"You would hardly agree, I suppose, with the recent article of the Rev. Phillips Brooks in the Princeton Review?"

"Perhaps not. In what particular?"

"Well, he seems to consider the dangers from scepticism greater than you do; its effect upon the Christian system more damaging and sweeping."

"If any one is disposed to be discouraged on account of the assaults in the present day upon Christianity, he may take confidence by a comparison of them with those of former days. In the time, for example, when Voltaire and his associates led their assault, there was far more of the educated mind enlisted in such hostility than now. There was far more of strong public sentiment on that side, while the religious life was dead as compared with its present life and vigor. I have no inclination to depreciate the labors of the students of natural science. I rejoice in all they have done and are doing to enlarge the domain of human knowledge; but science transcends its sphere when it seeks to interpret and announce, through its methods and instruments, the deep things of God—of the soul—man's spiritual life and destiny."

"You think, then, the doctrines of inspiration and those of the Church, usually accepted by evangelical Christians, rest on too secure a basis to be undermined by science?"

"Most certainly. Science can only discover phenomena. It runs along a line of cause and effect, but sooner or later it must stop. It can go no farther. It cannot go behind the cause. What is law? Simply a mode of the manifestation of the Author of Nature; that is all. If we find the Bible and science do not agree, it is not the fault of the book, but because we have misread it. Just as if you should go away from me and misrepresent what I said. I should say, if you were an honest man,—and I trust you are,—that you have failed to understand me."

"There has been much attention of late years to Oriental studies. I mean, especially, comparative mythologies and religions. Analogies have been discovered, through the translation of ancient sacred books, to the doctrines, ceremonies, and even moral teachings of Christianity. It is claimed that these militate against the special authority of the Bible and the Christian revelation."

"The discoveries of George Smith and other archaeologists in the East have greatly confirmed the Bible. The analogies to which you refer between Christianity and other ancient religions, instead of tending to weaken may serve to strengthen belief in the divine nature of the former. I maintain it is more reasonable to suppose that these various Oriental religions derived these maxims that have been applauded, it seems to me rather extravagantly, from an original revelation, at a very early period in man's history, than that they represent different degrees of evolution."

"There are those who exhibit a good deal of anxiety on account of Roman Catholicism in this country."

"It is for the most part simply a shifting of population from the Old World to this."

"Do you feel hopeful, Doctor, in regard to the Church, the future of Christianity?"

"Most certainly I do. It is spreading in heathen lands. Look at Australia and many such countries; compare them to-day with what they were one hundred years ago. Christianity is really stronger to-day than it ever was."

"You think, then, the Church will eventually subdue all to itself? Will it be the triumph of a single sect—your own, for example—or of Christianity in general?"

"In general, I think. In these days many persons have allowed themselves to drift away from the high and holy influences of religion. They have lived so long apart from it that they have lost the power of spiritual discernment and of understanding such things. It is said that 'if any man will do the will of God he shall know of the doctrine,'—which is truer than some are apt to suppose."

"You would, then, commend religion and worship as the great specific for scepticism and unbelief?"

"Yes."

The entrance here of visitors brought the interview to a close, and the Doctor accompanied the reporter to the door with a friendly parting.—N. Y. Graphic, May 5.

THE HOMES OF WORKING-PEOPLE IN LONDON.

At least one-half of London houses are unfit for human beings to reside in. All the rooms are made so small that any locomotion in them causes injury to walls, partitions, and fixtures. Everything becomes dilapidated, roughly worn, and consequently dirty. Then, their houses being sorry imitations of the homes of richer people, those who labor, thinking such display to be distinguished and correct, endeavor also in their sordid way to imitate their betters in their household goods and dress. Thus everything about the families and homes of working-men is now a travesty of the pernicious follies of the middle class, as these again are imitations of the social ranks above them. People do not spend their money to secure convenient, healthy homes, but to appear to be above their sphere, to be acquainted with the fashion, and to assert their right and interest in the foolish custom of the day. The cost and outlay that all this requires are quite sufficient to reduce the circumstances of the people from financial affluence to habitual penury; and this is actually its effect. The money which might be expended on the purchase of an unpretending, spacious, well-built house, is spent in worthless "elegance" and ornament; and the small, ill-ventilated hired rooms are crammed with cumbersome furniture and finery that make habitual cleanliness and health impossible and phthisis has become the national disease.

In such "rooms," quite inappropriately named, two millions of the London population are compelled to pass their lives; and the effect upon the social habits and the moral character of men and women is deplorable. A man and wife can live, perhaps, in quiet in these little dens; but when the family begins to grow, and children multiply, and move and play as children do, the father finds himself a surplussage at home, and goes for peace and quiet to the public house, to join his fellow-sufferers from leasehold tenure. There he, of course, must drink, and the habit comes and grows. The company is not select; the man, if tolerably educated and intelligent, meets numbers who are otherwise; and he must make the best of, or become the worse for, his companions. To invite a chosen, well-conditioned few to his own home would be absurd. He has no home; the place is but a cupboard, or is possibly a sty. In one small room all ordinary and domestic operations must be carried on; the men would therefore be entirely in the way; or if there is another cupboard, called the best front parlor, all its little floor occupied by quasi-fashionable table, sofa, easy-chair, and chiffonier, the necessary demonstrations of gentility; and not a yard of width is left for movement and for social comfort and companionship.

The women who are left, and are supposed to be at home, are possibly still greater sufferers; they never get fresh air, the slightest ventilation in such little rooms is felt as a cold draught; and doors and windows are, as far as may be, kept hermetically closed. The children either turn into the streets and live in dirt and license there,—lease-holds provide no playgrounds,—or if they are retained at home, they sicken, pine away, and die. The woman's health gives way, and as she is alone to do the household work, it is not done; the filth accumulates, and then the public house becomes again a refuge or relief. Both man and woman have lost hope and energy, and home repels them. They have no idea of acting for themselves, or of discovering what would most improve their state at home. The house is not their business, but the landlord's, and all houses for the working-classes are much the same; it is "their lot" and they accept it listlessly and sink into depravity.

The great concern that has of late been manifested by the upper classes for the benefit of workingmen, and the alarm that is so frequently expressed at the increased consumption of intoxicating drinks, together show that the condition of the working-classes in their homes is little known or understood. Intoxication as a habit is a common consequence, a natural result, of undersized, unwholesome rooms; and not the lower, but the middle and upper, classes, are the fabricators and maintainers of the leasehold system, which denies sufficient home accommodations to the poor. These classes are the real culprits in the case of metropolitan intemperance; and to them, much more than to the workingmen themselves, the vice and misery of drunkenness are due. The workingmen have yet to learn the method of their misery; when they attain this knowledge, and have also learnt the lesson of coöperative stores, they will promote societies to build on free-holds only, and will look for public sympathy in their determined, just repudiation of the modern leasehold system of house tenure.

There is a general, vague idea that because large free-holders appear to have some slight control, a better class of houses is erected under leasehold tenure than would be the case if each man had his separate free-hold. It is hardly necessary to argue out this question; the result of this insuring system is around us, and the inhabitants of London are, for their wealth and culture, the worst housed population on the globe. Nowhere in Europe can be seen such lines of paltry houses, with such cribs of rooms; and never was a people similarly subject to a landlord's interdict, prohibiting, by means of physical obstruction, ordinary social and domestic intercourse.—British Quarterly, April.

THE ENGLISH RACE.

"The English Race" was the topic of Prof. John Fiske in the last of his series of lectures on "American History" at the Old South. The term "Anglo-Saxon" he pronounced absurd and misleading, whether applied to a period of history, a language, or a people. He traced the origin of the English race, going back to the Iberian race, which inhabited Europe four thousand or five thousand years ago. This race was dark-complexioned and in direct contrast to the large-limbed and fair-haired Aryans of Central Asia. The latter gradually moved west and south, conquered the Iberians and mingled with them in marriage, accounting for the various complexions to be seen now in the English races. The offspring of these marriages became the Greeks and Italians of the eastern peninsula of Europe and the Spaniards of the western peninsula; other branches of the Aryans, the Gauls and Celts, the Teutons, and last of all the Slavs, came into the country, and all contributed to the formation of the English race, which originally sprang from really only two races, the Iberians and Aryans. Their characteristics can be distinguished in a few instances, but in general the mixture is very complex. In regard to calling Americans a mixed race, Mr. Fiske thought the term was a wrong one. According to Bancroft, in 1834 two-thirds of the population of the United States were of Puritan descent. In 1870, about three-quarters were of English origin.

It was not until the American Revolution that it began to be realized that the colonies must soon become Imperial States far greater than the States which planted them. It is not realized even now. The capacity and steadiness of this national growth lead us to wonderful conclusions as we forecast the future. The settlement of America excited from the beginning a reactive influence upon the material development of England, multiplying the dimensions of the foreign trade, increasing her commercial marine, and giving her the dominion of the seas. Endowed with this supremacy, she has, during the last two centuries, been seizing the keys of empire in all parts of the world. The national outcome of all this overflowing vitality is not hard to foresee.

If we look at Australia we find a country of more than two-thirds of the area of the United States, with a temperate climate and immense resources, sparsely peopled by a race of savages hardly above the level of brutes. Here England, within the present century, has planted four thriving States. In New Zealand the English race is multiplying rapidly, and a population of from fifty to seventy millions can be supported there. I need not enlarge upon these facts; the briefest indications will tell the story. It means the supremacy of the English race, of the English language, of English political ideas, and of Protestant Christianity in the future work of the world. The day is at hand when the nations of twenty-five or forty millions, like Italy and France of the present time, can only claim such a relative position to the rest of the political world as Holland and Switzerland now occupy. In the face of this, it seems probable that Europe will adopt the lesson of federalism, in order to do away with the chances for useless warfare, which remain as long as the different States own no allegiance to a common authority. In a confederacy of European States, peculiar difficulties would arise from differences of race and language. But such difficulties have been surmounted on a small scale by Switzerland. To surmount them on a great scale will be the future problem of Europe; and it is America which has set the example and indicated the method.

ANOTHER FREEMAN HORROR.

In 1857 Giles Hitchins was a farmer in Concord County, Delaware. One evening during the progress of a protracted Methodist meeting he was stated to be under deep conviction. He went home late at night in a state of great excitement. The sermon had been about Abraham and the sacrifice of Isaac. This appeared to have made a great impression upon him, and he slept but little, getting up early and going to the woods to pray. His own story was that during the night he had heard the voice of God which commanded him to kill his little son and offer his blood as a sacrifice. In the morning he went to the woods and was again commanded, as he said, to make the offering. He did not dare to disobey, and went back to the house where the babe was sleeping and its mother watching over him. Not wishing to alarm his wife he waited until she went out, and then took the child in his arms and carried it to the potato-patch, having in the meantime prepared a keen knife. Then he waited like Abraham, hoping that the Lord would speak to him again and command some other offering, but he received no signs. Then he became alarmed lest his wife might be watching, and crossing the field went into the woods, where he laid the child upon some fallen leaves and again prayed. During the prayer a little dog ran up to him and sniffed about his feet. Supposing that, like Abraham's ram, this dog had been sent by the Lord in place of the child, he waited to hear a voice commanding him to kill the dog; but no voice said, "Stay thy hand," and he held the struggling infant while he cut its throat and offered up its blood to the Lord. Then taking the body in his arms he bore it to the house, the blood dripping as he walked, and laid it upon the bed. He was tried for murder, the prosecution being conducted with great vigor; but the jury, who with the judge and all the spectators were intensely affected, brought in a verdict of not guilty, on the plea of insanity, without leaving their seats.—New York World.

Poetry.

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON.

[The following lines were read by their author at the meeting of colored citizens, at Twelfth Baptist Church, Boston, on the evening of the 26th ult.]

Finished! a hero's task! From sea to sea,
The race he led from chains to liberty
Stand all bewildered at the crushing blow,
Blinded with tears, unknowing where to go.
He who so long hath been their faithful guide,
Lies cold in death: who lives there now beside?

O Garrison! around thine hallowed bier
A grateful race is kneeling; and the tear
Is falling like the gentle summer rain
When the sun's rays have scorched the verdant plain.
Dearer to us than mortal tongue can tell,
Through slavery's night our faithful sentinel!

To thee we turned when thunders o'er us rolled,
And danger's signal 'midst the tempest tolled;
Firm and unflinching through proscription's blast,
Though on thy shield the foe's darts fell fast:
And dying hope revived in us to see
Thy bright sword waving on to victory.

Thou canst not die! for in our heart of hearts
Thou'lt live till life and gratitude depart,—
Live till the memory of the galling chain,
The crack of whip, the piercing cry of pain
Shall fade, and the bright sheaves of freedom's grain
Shall hide the mildew of foul slavery's stain.

Rise, Liberator, to thy just reward!
Mercy and love thy noble deeds record,
Thou fearless champion of a hated race!
Ascend in glory to thine honored place;
A people bear their witness to thy truth,
And show a ransomed continent in proof.

O God, we thank Thee that in our great need
Thou didst anoint a man of word and deed,
Who, like a rock amid an angry sea,
Stood firm for Right, for Truth and Liberty;
Shouting thy mandate to the vengeful foe,—
Thus saith Jehovah: "Let my people go!"

Farewell, farewell, our earliest, dearest friend;
Rest thee in peace, thy struggles have an end:
The race for whom thou perilled life to save,
Know thee, their champion, earnest, pure, and brave;
Foremost of all who have their duty done,
The world shall hail the name of Garrison.

The Index.

BOSTON, JUNE 26, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLKDO OFFICE, No. 35 MONROE STREET: J. T. FAY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

GREETING.

As has been already announced, the editorial charge of THE INDEX passes, for a period, to other hands with the present issue. Its readers, we are sure, will join us in regret at the painful cause of this withdrawal of the editor from the post of service which he has so long and worthily filled. Apart from the sad occasion of the change, all must concede that he has well earned the respite thus afforded from his labors. In entering upon the work which he temporarily lays aside, we are moved to take a slight advantage of the situation. The absence of friends sometimes permits a freedom from restraint which it might seem proper to observe in their presence. It is this that prompts us to a parting word of acknowledgment and appreciation in reference to him whose name and personality have become almost a synonym for this paper.

Ten years ago THE INDEX began its existence in a comparatively small Western town. Its projector was not unknown. When quite young, he had already acquired distinction within a limited circle, as a scholar and writer of unusual promise upon metaphysical subjects. Still later he became known, in a wider and somewhat different sphere, as an earnest and thoughtful advocate of greater intellectual freedom in religious fellowship. At this time he contributed a remarkable essay to a Unitarian review on "The Ethics of the Pulpit," which had an important influence then, as it has had since, upon young ministers halting in indecision between fidelity to conviction and expediency, in determining their course of action. It maintained it to be the bounden duty of the preacher to sacrifice and put utterly beneath his feet every consideration of place and policy for the free utterance of his highest and best conceptions of the truth. These bold and stirring words were from the occupant of a Unitarian pulpit, at the outset of his professional career. It was at a time, moreover, when the Unitarian denomination was struck with alarm at the growth of radical tendencies within its fold. Its traditions were opposed to creeds, but the decision prevailed that it would not do in the present crisis to take counsel of its antecedents. The conservatives of the body, unhappily the predominant portion, were victorious. It was concluded that the only salvation for the Unitarian type of Christianity, which of course was complacently regarded the unquestionable and single facsimile of its Judean original, was to compel all its ministers to attest their soundness of faith by assent to certain verbal affirmations. Into this controversy Mr. Abbot entered with an uncompromising ardor, energy, and clearness of intelligence, which soon caused him to break through the Unitarian lines.

THE INDEX was started as a vindicator and exponent of the broader movement of freethought in religion with which he now became identified. With what force and culture of intellect, incontrovertible argument, keenness of insight, steadfast purpose, and faithfulness to a high ideal this object has been pursued, all are familiar who have been observers of its course. It is but simple justice to say, that to no one in America has liberalism for the last decade been more indebted. There is no one who has more persistently defended its honor and good name, who has given to it greater self-sacrifice, more heroic and valuable devotion. The logical vigor and power of subtle analysis with which he has discussed the complicated questions of society, ethics, and philosophy, as they have arisen, have commanded the respectful attention and won the strong sympathy of many of the purest and most enlightened of the time.

The influence which he has thus exerted has been of incalculable benefit to freethinkers. It has done much to dispel the fogs of a crude and lawless rationalism from their mental atmosphere. It has enabled them to discern a straight path, where else they were liable to wander into the quagmires and thorny thickets of wild hallucinations and degrading animalism, besides imparting greater dignity and a more elevated tone to the cause they represent.

The worth of this service we believe to be destined to win, hereafter, a juster appreciation than it has yet received. Even when difference of opinion has been provoked, it has been impossible for any rightly constituted mind to honestly question the lofty principle of his character or the purity of his motives.

The position of Mr. Abbot in connection with THE INDEX has all along been an exceedingly arduous one. It has exacted almost incessant toil, and been attended with oppressive anxieties and peculiar vexations. To those most conversant with the experience, it has been a perpetual marvel that he has been able to sustain so effectually the burden upon his physical and mental energies. A sympathetic consideration of these things will reconcile the friends of THE INDEX to his absence, and secure a lenient judgment for his successor.

In assuming the trust we have accepted, it shall be our aim to preserve, so far as we may, the high standard of excellence the paper has maintained, and to make it reflect our best conceptions of the true interests of liberalism. May we not hope that those who have at heart its prosperity will feel in some measure responsible with us for its conduct during this term of less experienced management, and that their increased solicitude and coöperation may atone for our deficiencies?

And with these hopes we join that of all who love them to Mr. Abbot and his invalid wife, for a safe and prosperous voyage to their island destination, whither they will sail before these words are printed. May she return with health restored, and be with energies reinvigorated for the exalted life-purposes which for a brief interval he abandons.

DAVID H. CLARK.

THE ERA OF CONSTRUCTION.

Among the strong utterances which remain of the late Professor William Kingdon Clifford, who should have died hereafter, is the following: "Thought is powerless except it make something outside of itself; the thought which conquers the world is not contemplative but active. And it is this that I am asking you to worship to-day."

And yet Professor Clifford would have been the last person in the world to depreciate the value of the solitary contemplative thinker. Indeed, he was, himself, with all his exuberant and active energy, a remarkable example of this very intellectual tendency. His mind was much given to theory and speculation. But he believed in action as well as thinking, in deeds as well as words. In this respect the illustrious leader of freethought in England, whose light has suddenly gone out, represented in a striking manner the new spirit which appears to be entering into liberalism; in other words, the constructive disposition which it begins to manifest, and to which attention is now being directed. It is true that there have been signs of such aspirations from the earliest dawn of rationalism; but the time has never before seemed so ripe for their practical embodiment. They were foreshadowed as early as the days of Auguste Comte. The great French philosopher saw very plainly that the old inherited orders of society and systems of religion were doomed and dying. But he erred in concluding that the process of their dissolution was more rapid than the actual state of the case. The existing conditions of France were assumed to be a type of wider and more general ones. His philosophy compelled admiration. It was bold and grand in its generalizations and constructive conceptions, but seriously defective in some of its essential principles.

The religion of humanity which he prefigured was a blending of incongruous elements. It preserved so much of the cumbersome ceremonial and stereotyped character of the old systems which it sought to supersede as to render it ill-adapted to the growing and varied developments of the later time. Still the prescience of Comte, as is thus shown, is worthy of all praise. The ultimate demand of the rationalistic reformation then setting in was discerned. He saw that if rationalism was to issue in anything, that unless it meant the utter extinction and impossibility of intellectual concert and associated action among men, a wild babel of distracting individualities, it must eventually take on new forms and institutions; if the historic faiths of mankind were destroyed they must be replaced by something better; that the sentiments and predispositions upon which they had been built were inherent and ineradicable. The great need was not their annihilation, but guidance and direction, under freer and more enlightened conditions, to a worthier and truer expression. Thus Comte possessed the instinct and vision of the seer. He was the great forerunner of constructive radicalism.

There has been a wonderful progress of freethought since his time. Science has advanced with unprecedented celerity. It has created a new heavens and earth. Its influence has permeated all forms of society and departments of thought. The impulse given to it in religion by the infidels and deists of a hundred years ago in France and England has gone forward broadening and deepening with irresistible sweep until it has swelled into a mighty movement. There has been a continual loosening and snapping of the old bands of authority, of dissatisfaction with and rejection of tenets and articles of belief which have been accounted essentials of faith and the indispensables of religion. Universalism, Unitarianism, and various other more advanced and protesting sects have each, in their own way, contributed to the result. All honor to each and all of them for the brave fights they have fought, the measure of dim sight with which they have performed their work in their day and generation, though deplorably inadequate and inconsistent it has often been, compared with that of those of broader view and more heroic spirit who have toiled beside them. Through such influences as these, operating within the Church and without, not only upon the protesting sects but also upon those within the lines of the old dogmas, and even not unfrequently with more rapid effect, the whole intellectual and religious life of society has been changed. The home of faith, the shelter and centre of the hopes and aspirations of numerous generations, has been undermined and subjected to rapid decadence. There has been a general upheaving of its foundations. Its supports are dislocated and twisted out of place. There are no bands or bolts, no patching or cement, that can permanently hold it together. It is clear as sunlight that it is destined at last to wholly perish, that it is too cramped, ill-contrived, and insecure to answer to the growing and ultimate demands of humanity. Many have long seen this and endeavored with great earnestness and persuasion to show it to others.

It was but natural that those who were thus impelled to forsake what they had so long been accustomed to should experience some self-distrust and cast lingering looks behind; that much time should be spent in self-justification, even after the inevitable was perceived, and in pointing out the defects of that which they were deserting. It required time for those making this departure to understand themselves and their situation and see the work before them. That period now has passed. The development of rationalism, which is all we mean by the simple figure which we have just employed to illustrate our conviction, has proceeded far enough, and is sufficiently strong and confirmed, clear in intelligence, and master of itself to see that there is a great constructive work awaiting it,—a work outside of the old order of things, yet not without the use of whatever belongs to it that can be rendered available; a work which can only be carried forward effectually by those who believe in laying deeper, firmer, and broader foundations.

The time has come for rationalism to vindicate its principles and the nobility of its spirit by surpassing achievements, not designed to simply startle and arrest attention, but inspired by a pure and lofty disinterestedness and enlightened consecration toward good works in the service of humanity such as the world never yet has seen, and to the perception of which, in any considerable degree, but few have yet attained; to begin to lay the stones of this enduring temple of the future and to take the first steps toward the elaboration of this prospective religion of humanity. In the next INDEX, and perhaps in one or more subsequent numbers, we shall endeavor to show some of the circumstances and possibilities of this work, and the modes at hand through which it may be initiated.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

The people of Cape Cod are generally, I believe, rather Orthodox in religion; but East Dennis is a very liberal village. Many of its leading citizens are retired sea-captains who have braved many a storm and made voyages to the most distant ports. It is one of the towns where the old anti-slavery heroes, a generation ago, hurled their invectives against the slave power and denounced in fiercest language the evangelical churches for their support of, or indifference to, the sin of American slavery. Garrison, Wright, Pillsbury, and the other "fanatics" always had hearers and supporters at East Dennis. Now the same men and women that were interested in the cause of negro emancipation are, with the younger generation, not less interested in the cause of mental freedom, and are working for the advancement of liberal thought. The day was very warm, but the hall was filled, day and evening, and the audiences seemed to be thoughtful, earnest, and appreciative.

A number of liberal speakers have been there, and the attendance has usually been good. In the forenoon I went sailing, but there was no breeze and our party were not tempted to go far. I passed my boyhood days by the sea, and I now delight to be near it, to sail on it, and to bathe in it when the waves run high. I cherish many pleasant recollections of my visits to Cape Cod.

At Port Jervis, N.Y., I was recently in debate five evenings with Rev. Wm. I. Gill. It was fairly attended, and, to me at least, a very pleasant affair. It was reported briefly by the two dailies published there, and excited considerable interest. Mr. Gill is a gentleman of much ability, and is author of works that possess real merit. One of them, Evolution and Progress, has caused him much trouble with his ministerial brethren, and soon after its publication the question whether he should be permitted to remain in the Methodist Conference was warmly discussed. The decision was in his favor, but his ability and liberality were rewarded by his being sent to a little village of two or three hundred inhabitants, where his influence is restricted, and where he can meditate on the fate that awaits him if he continues to exhibit to the world the weakness of the Orthodox objections to the theory of evolution.

The Methodist Church is no place for such a man as Mr. Gill. I found him a fair and honorable opponent, and a debater of more than average ability. He was not encouraged by the clergy of Port Jervis, who advised their congregations not to attend. Port Jervis is a city of some fourteen thousand inhabitants, and there is a good deal of liberal sentiment in the place.

I was recently at Salem, Ohio. The "Broad Gauge Church" has no regular meetings now, but I was informed that there are more outspoken free-thinkers there than ever before. My audience was the largest I ever addressed in that town, in which I have given not fewer than thirty lectures. There seems to be no desire at the present time among the Salem liberals for organization. They seem to think that liberal thought pervades the entire community to such an extent that there is no urgent reason for any continued united effort on their part. A year or two hence, they may take it into their heads to resuscitate their society and have regular meetings again.

Last Sunday morning I spoke again at Irwin, where last spring I was arrested for occupying the school-house "for immoral purposes." No suitable hall could be had, and the meeting was held in a grove near the village. In spite of rain, which commenced falling early in the morning, a large crowd assembled, and I was listened to an hour and a half without the slightest interruption. Had the day been pleasant, there is no doubt I would have had an audience of a thousand or fifteen hundred; and this is the town in which a few weeks ago the clergy and the rigidly Orthodox were determined I should not speak, and in which they thought they could suppress liberal views by an appeal to the law! They have learned their mistake already. The Orthodox people of Irwin concede that they were too hasty. The village has five times as many outspoken liberals now as it had when I first spoke there.

My trial was to come off May 14, but was postponed. The case was transferred from the criminal to the civil list, and the charge of using the school-house for an "immoral purpose" has been, I am credibly informed, abandoned. The case is not likely to come up in any form, for the persons whose zeal, outstripping their knowledge, led them into this folly now see that they have neither law nor reason, neither justice nor generosity, on their side. I return to Irwin and give another address in the grove next month. The ministers have been preaching against "infidelity" ever since my first visit to the town. Other preachers from abroad have been imported there to show the truth and divinity of the Bible. The Pittsburgh Leader, an independent paper, which is exerting a very liberalizing influence in that region of country, advises the ministers of Irwin to meet me in discussion, to allow me to occupy their pulpits even, and then, if they can, expose my sophistries and the strength of their own positions.

I hear but one opinion expressed in regard to the sentence of D. M. Bennett, and that is that it is unjust. Even many persons of Orthodox proclivities declare there is no justice or reason in punishing a publisher for putting in the mails a little pamphlet of which the worst that can be said is that it is a flimsy and shallow argument against marriage. If the pamphlet were really obscene, and designed to corrupt the morals of youth, I should regard the sentence none too severe; but it is not: and but for the most absurd charge of Judge Benedict, the jury never would have brought in a verdict of guilty. Mr. Bennett's taste in helping circulate this work, and his wisdom in doing so when Heywood had been convicted for the same thing, may be fairly questioned; but both Heywood and Bennett, I am satisfied, are victims of a spirit of persecution which has used the United States courts to accomplish its ends, and made the suppression of obscenity a pretext merely for persecuting persons whose views and methods are distasteful to the public. With such postal agents as Comstock and such judges as Benedict, no advocate of unpopular theories can feel safe.

EXPLANATORY.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

When ordinary hearers misunderstand and misrepresent me, I sigh over the inadequacy of the English language and the auditory imperfections of audiences, and—let the matter go. I suppose every public speaker finds misunderstandings so common that at last he gives up all idea of tracking them down with attempts at correction. But Mrs. Cheney is not an ordinary hearer; and her article in THE INDEX for June 19 is likely to produce an impression that I am not willing to be responsible for.

I will not contradict Mrs. Cheney and assert that I did not say what she says I did; but I must, in justice to myself and the truth, assert that I did not mean to say anything of the kind. She makes me responsible for saying "that religion has no essential connection with morality." What I meant to say, and still think true beyond question, is that originally the two had no essential connection, and, as a matter of fact, have had very little historic connection in the past. The instances she cites, as for example from the Hebrew Scriptures, are comparatively modern, when we remember how long man has lived on the earth. And it must be remembered that these exceptional words of prophets do not represent the real popular life or belief of the age. They were rather protests against the state of things I asserted to be the general condition. And this, Mrs. Cheney herself admits is still true of the Catholic and Calvinistic faiths. And what is this but to say that it is still the prevailing condition of affairs?

I have indeed spoken these five years in Boston to little purpose, and may as well give it up, if I have left the impression on any intelligent minds that I believe that true religion and true morality have no essential connection. I believe that they are so nearly related that they are practically one. But I assert without fear of intelligent contradiction, that hitherto, all over the world and in all religions, the most of that which has been popularly called religion has had no essential relation to morality, and that what we now call morality has not been looked upon as an essential part of religion.

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON.

I referred to Josiah Warren because I supposed his definition of individualism would be generally accepted as the true one by those who call themselves individualists, and that his formulation would be regarded as consistent. Warren certainly derived his limitation from the source whence came the principle itself; namely, from the nature of things, the constitution of the universe as he understood it. He believed, and I suppose all individualists do, in the supremacy of reason, and he maintained that the individual reason should govern in the individual sphere. He regarded his formula as scientific, and in point of fact they are most logically and clearly stated in a book called The Science of Society.

I do not think the individualist recognizes the existence in society of a "universal reason" apart from the reason of individuals, and they do not admit that the reasoning or the notions of a majority are necessarily correct because they are accepted by the many.

I cannot speak for individualists, but for myself I can say that the six principles formulated by THE INDEX meet my hearty concurrence, and I presume, as they seem to me to be stating the ideas laid down by Warren in other words, that his followers will agree with them also.

But this discussion originally grew up about the question as to what the Universal Reason has to say on the right of society to attempt the cure of certain evils and the punishment of certain offenders in a particular way. It happens that the persons who took a leading part in advocating the repeal of laws which they believed to be unscientific, unjust, and inefficient are not, so far as I know them, all individualists either "consistent or inconsistent," but some of them are rather Altruists or Communists, others Social Scientists who aim as I do to be Intellectuals.

Now, on this question,—first, what is the offence; second, what has society a right to do, and what is it the duty of society and of individuals to do in the premises; who are "those who know" and what is their "agreement"?

For one, I consider the question an open one. I have seen no facts or arguments adduced which convince me that science or the scientific method sustains the reformers; on the contrary, appeals to the average standard of the day (Consensus of the Incompetent) and denunciation of those who think science says repeal, as abettors of immorality, seem to me to form the staple of the attack upon the repealers. For myself I say unhesitatingly, that I submit to the decision of science; that I ardently desire to know what the scientific method will demonstrate to be true, as to this and all other social questions; and I do not believe any intelligent man can be found hardy enough to set up his "private judgment" as against the decision of science or the sovereignty of reason, be he called individualist, socialist, or liberal.

Let us not forget that all progress in science has been made in the past, and probably will be made in the future, by the efforts of individual minds, at first usually against the received opinion or accepted science of the day.

Sociology is one of the most complex of the special sciences, and consequently one of the latest to be developed; and owing to the part which feeling plays, ourselves and our relations being the objects of it, it is most difficult to arrive at a canon of criticism upon which all can agree.

It seems to me that as the object of society is to produce, nourish, and maintain perfect individuals, and as society is only the form in which human beings place themselves, as it is a means to an end, it is safer to lean to the side of the fullest freedom of the individual to work out his destiny and discover what form of society is the best adapted to his needs.

There is no danger that the individual will destroy or oppress society, but society does oppress and destroy many individuals. It is better to be free and do wrong, than it is to be an automaton or a slave. It is only freemen who can do either wrong or right, and only he can be said to be truly free who is governed by reason.

Will some one point us to the laws of science instead of human statutes; will some one show us those who know, and point out the principles which they agree to consider settled? F. S. C.

IS MIND MATTER?

MR. ABBOT:—

In THE INDEX lately, or somewhere else, I read in substance this: "If it is said we are conscious of something besides matter, something different from it called mind, we reply. We are conscious of sensation, thought, desire, volition, but not of mind as a distinct existence." The conclusion is,—no mind, or sensations only. Again, "We know but of one substance, that which is called matter." But how do we know there is "one substance" only? All we know is, that we have certain sensations. This is all we know about there being "one substance." In this argument, then, I can't see that the materialists have any advantage over the immaterialists.

Our sensations give the same proof of mind as of matter; I have a little piece of experience, and all have similar ones. When I was less than three years old there occurred the total eclipse of 1806. My recollections of that event are now distinct. I am conscious that it is the same mind now which recollects it that experienced the impression it produced when it happened. The question is, On what was the remembered impression made? On matter, such as bones, nerves, flesh, blood, etc.? All these things since that time have many times passed away and been renewed; not a vestige of the matter then forming my body remains. Yet I am conscious that that upon which the impression was then made still remains. What is it which still remains? Materialists, can you give us a little light on this phenomenon? E. L. CRANE.

SOUL AND LIFE.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

I like THE INDEX in that both sides of questions are often so clearly presented, and never more so than in the two articles in the last number (No. 492), entitled "Life" and "Molecular Potencies." How strong is the appeal in the latter to the "Consensus of the Competent," how keen the edge of its cutting sarcasm and reproach as to the theory of "Life." And yet its writer knew nothing of B. F. U.'s intention as to writing "Life." I ask the readers of THE INDEX to reread those two productions; and, with the kindest feelings towards their respective authors, and B. F. U. in particular, they will say that R. H. has most effectually refuted his idea of the almightiness of matter.

Sometimes it will be found that the competent will be best reached by an appeal to the sense of the ludicrous, and R. H. has well put it that we must all uncover to the Molecular Potencies with the profoundest reverence and veneration!

I would say, however, to B. F. U., that if he is not conscious (and he implies that he is not) "of the existence of the mind itself," so much the worse for the condition of his consciousness! I am in the formula of common-sense and rationalism, and of science too, which is but another word, in its relation to mind, for experience in its a priori and a posteriori aspect.

Now I do not object to doubt. We must doubt ourselves, or lose ourselves to find ourselves; must know the Not-Me to find the Me; must doubt our existence to find, as Franklin did, that we are spirits in the land of spirits, here and now! Mind is therefore a manifestation from the internal to the external and back again, in endless ebb and flow, whilst the spirit remains detached in a world of sense. As to the soul, it is perfectly normal and healthful to know, as our happiness (stability) consists at times in being associated from whence we came. It is an illusion, a cheat, and a sham, to lose ourselves entirely in materiality. We are conscious of the solidarity of our thoughts and feelings, by and through our individual existence as a positive entity which has the power of thinking and feeling! And as he speaks of the unthinkable, what is more unthinkable than that certain motions of atoms in the brain should generate consciousness, and love, and thought, and bliss!—so say the most eminent physiologists, Tyndall among them.

B. F. U. holds that mind consists of certain faculties and material conditions, five senses, a perfect brain, with its corresponding nerves, etc., etc. But these are known, and external to the being that knows, as anything that is known is to that which knows. It therefore follows that there must be a positive entity called soul. As some seem to dislike such terms, some other might be employed. This positive and immortal entity might be called matter invisible; any term might be used as a symbol, so as to illustrate that deep and insward, "in the midst of thee," is the principle of life and being. It is a "seed" or spark proceeding from God, and is capable of assimilation or oneness with the eternal mind.

ESTHETIC CONCEPTIONS CORRELATED WITH THE ENVIRONMENT.

BY WILEY BRITTON.

NO. VIII.

The relics of primitive art show us that our early ancestors only attempted the representation of animate and inanimate things which existed in their environments. Indeed, nothing could be more astonishing to us than to hear the untutored savages of an oceanic island enthusiastically describing continental scenery, or any of the beautiful forms of life foreign to their peculiar and isolated habitat. Nor would it be less astonishing to find arctic peoples whose lives have been confined to their frigid habitats, and who have received no perceptible influence from external sources, able to give vivid descriptions of tropical forests and tangles, and vice versa.

Let us understand by the term environment that portion of surrounding space, with the coexistences and sequences contained in it, of which the organism has some definite knowledge, and which exercises a sensible influence upon the life of the organism. It will then be seen that the environment is ever widening with the progress of intelligence or ability of the organism to adjust its actions to ever-increasing complex relations. The environment of the savage may not extend beyond the limits of his natural habitat, while it would be difficult to set even an approximate limit to the environment of the naturalist or travelled geologist. With the widening and increasing complexity of its environment, the organism, if it survives and perpetuates its species, is required to adjust its actions to an ever-increasing number of coexistences and sequences. Now, those tribes of the lower human races which exhibit the least social development, or social relations of the simplest kind, and whose environments are regarded as exceedingly simple, we should naturally expect to find possess relatively undeveloped aesthetic conceptions. And this is just what we do find. The Esquimaux, Rushmen, Feungsans, and other tribes, who, on account of the barren and inhospitable nature of their habitats, are obliged to live in small and isolated groups, have aesthetic conceptions in perfect harmony with their conditions. Amongst rural populations, too, of the most civilized countries, where there are no active social relations between the members of separate families, and where the social pulse is languid, a sense of the beautiful in almost every direction is less developed than amongst members of the same nationality living in business centres where industrial and commercial activities are constantly bringing men in contact with each other. Again, the backwardness of country people in adopting new inventions and improvements pertaining to the industrial and manufacturing interests of society, and their want of taste in dress and decoration, have long been recognized by the more thoughtful observers of human nature in its manifold manifestations. Their persistence in ancestral habits and customs long obsolete in the cities and towns has sometimes been regarded as wilful perversity rather than the result of circumstances, and has, not unfrequently, evoked uncharitably expressed opinions from those of more pretentious culture. The word Pagan, now used to convey the idea of rude and illiterate idolator, was originally applied to people living in the country and small villages, and who persisted in the worship and religious customs of their ancestors long after the people of the more densely populated localities and centres of more active social life and intelligence were converted to the new religion. But history and experience teach us that habits, customs, and religious beliefs correlated with a particular kind of environment change only as the environment changes. And we also know that a new doctrine or new idea never spreads as rapidly amongst dispersed and isolated social units as amongst men living in contact with each other.

A vulgar taste in dress is to our minds correlated with an environment in which little is known of the harmonious combinations of colors, and in which cognoscents of the tailoring and millinery arts are few in number or indifferently patronized. Thus it is an unquestionable fact that persons brought up outside of the current of social activities display less taste in dress and decoration than those brought up in the midst of active social relations where every one is a critic and every one is criticised. In the cities, ladies who pride themselves upon dressing with taste and being stylish, and who will tell you with great minuteness the colors and shades that should be worn by those of given complexions as most becoming to them, quickly observe peculiarities of dress correlated with rural life. With almost every one exhibiting taste in dress and decoration, there is that kind of egotism displayed which associates the achievements of self with the admiration of self by others; and the thought of such admiration of self by others is the principal stimulus to aesthetic development. But there is egotism of another kind with which admiration of self by others is not associated as a necessary consequence; for there are many instances in which achievements of self cause self-gratulation whether witnessed by any one else or not. And there are instances, too, in which failure in a given enterprise or undertaking causes a feeling of mortification or self-condemnation, whether the failure is witnessed by or known to any one else or not. Misspelling a familiar word or an intellectual blunder causes a feeling of vexation and self-condemnation, though not known to any one else. It would not be difficult to multiply illustrations. From what has been said, I think it may be safely assumed that a high order of taste in dress and decoration is impossible where the surrounding conditions are unfavorable for making a great variety of contrasts; for in order to make discriminations between things and attributes of things, as sounds, colors, movements, etc., there must be perceptions of difference; and of course there can be no perceptions of difference without contrast. Not only is there a low order of taste generally displayed in dress and decoration by those living in localities where the current of social activities is feeble, but there is also a persistent conservatism that has a great dread of change in such matters. The slow changes in styles of dress of country people, particularly of those living in localities distant from, and not in active communication with, the larger cities and towns, have been observed from very early times by those who have written upon the habits and customs of their countrymen. Take a rustic who has had but few opportunities of improving and cultivating his taste in dress and personal appearance, and propose to him a new style of dress, and the chances are that, instead of adopting it, he will reply that what was good enough for his father and grandfather is good enough for him. His ideal of greatness and of goodness lies in the past rather than in the future, so indissolubly is his life correlated with surrounding conditions. Hence his feeble excursions of thought, and his inability to enter into involved chains of reasoning, make it impossible for him to accept when first presented ideas he sees that, if accepted, must change his entire course of life. The result is, that those who are shut out from the active social life of the populous commercial and business centres go on for generation after generation in the habits and customs of their ancestors, with scarcely a perceptible change in their styles of dress and modes of life. Contrasting the taste in dress and decoration, as described by travellers, of those tribes of savages whose habitats require them to live in dispersed and isolated families, with the taste displayed by tribes whose habitats permit considerable aggregations of individuals, and a marked difference is observable,—a difference, too, showing that the habits, customs, and modes of life of each tribe are correlated with its particular environment.

Awkwardness, ungraceful movements, and carriage of the body, etc., are all correlated with an environment in which little or no attention is given to callisthenics. We rarely see those who have been brought up in the country where circumstances make social intercourse infrequent whose movements are what we consider graceful and easy; but, on the contrary, their movements are generally clumsy, awkward, angular. The motions and carriage of the body, as in skating, dancing, walking, and riding, all tend to excite the aesthetic feelings, and arouse agreeable or disagreeable states of consciousness, varying in intensity according to the degree in which they harmonize with our notions of gracefulness. Even the motions and carriage of the body of an animal of certain species, as a horse for example, may excite an aesthetic thrill in those who are familiar with contrasting the movements of various animals, or the movements of the same animal under different conditions. And watching the movements and carriage of a fine saddle-horse, after having watched the movements and carriage of a heavy draught-horse, produces in those sensible of the various movements of a horse a wave of delight similar to that produced in the admirer of gracefulness by watching the performance of a graceful danseuse, after having watched the performance of a clumsy and ill-formed dancer. The movements and carriage of a horse may perhaps be distinguished as graceful or clumsy, even by people living under conditions where we would not expect to find much attention given to animal movements. But it will hardly be held that those whose lives have been devoted to rural occupations, where social intercourse is infrequent, are as discriminative of the movements of horses, even though they raise them, as the jockey or horse-fancier of the large horse-markets, whose success in business may depend largely upon his being able to appreciate the various shades of movements of an animal, as well as its other general and special qualities.

Odd as the statement may appear to many, I think we shall find warrant for making it, that the movements and forms or shapes of animals, also, are correlated with the environment. For instance, any one familiar with the morphology of the several varieties of sheep may almost instantly decide with accuracy whether a given individual of a mixed flock belongs to a lowland or mountainous breed, or whether it belongs to a breed that has had much or little care bestowed upon it by man. That isolated and barren localities are noted for producing inferior breeds of animals, and that thickly settled and fertile localities are noted for producing fine breeds, are facts I suppose familiar to every general stock-dealer. And no doubt this general inferiority consists in part of the movements of the limbs and carriage of the body, as well as in other special or general attributes. In fact, if an animal's movements and carriage can be improved by selection and breeding, as well as its color, form, proportion, etc., the conditions are beyond doubt more favorable for making such improvements in localities where many persons of developed conceptions of animal movements, form, etc., are in competition engaged in raising the particular animal, than in an isolated locality where a single individual of undeveloped conceptions of animal movements, form, etc., raises the particular variety of animal without any thought of these attributes in connection with ideas of beauty.

Let us look at another phase of these correlations, and interpose a needed qualification. While the proportion of people living in rural localities, whose general movements are not particularly faulty, may be about as large as it is with people living in contact with each other, the proportion whose various special movements are less perfect and graceful than the latter is much larger. A person who has inherited a good constitution, and who has a very perfect physical organization, even though brought up in comparative isolation, may, in his general movements, such as are gone through in pursuing his every-day occupations, be perfect and graceful enough to satisfy the requirements of a cultivated aesthetic sentiment. But his various special movements, such as are required to be gone through by those living in active social relations, do not satisfy in a high degree the requirements of a cultivated aesthetic sentiment. In company and in the presence of friends whom he does not often meet, his body appears cramped and rigid, and the movements of his limbs clumsy and awkward; and as interpreted by the language of the emotions, his whole demeanor presents an aspect of uneasiness and as one being out of his proper sphere. And in either standing or sitting, he is generally at a loss to know what to do with his hands, and the chances are they will be so placed as to give the position of his body and limbs a symmetrical appearance instead of an asymmetrical appearance, as is required to make one's position appear natural and easy. Those who have had opportunities of examining the sculptures of the ancient Egyptians have no doubt been strongly impressed with the unnaturalness of the figures on account of the symmetrical appearance of the body and limbs relatively to surrounding things. So, too, do the statues and other figures, representing men and animals, of the inferior uncivilized races from different parts of the world similarly show us this rigidity of expression.

Industrial appliances, also, are correlated with the environment, and show something of the activity of social life of which they are the products. For instance, certain sections of the country which, on account of their barren and broken physical conditions and the infertility of their soils, are able to sustain only light populations, consisting mostly of single families much dispersed, continue to use almost entirely the implements and industrial appliances that were used by their ancestors a century ago.

MRS. CLARA NEYMANN BEFORE THE TURNER SOCIETY.

The following abstract of Mrs. Neymann's recent lecture before the Turner Society should have appeared earlier:—

The lecturer spoke in her native tongue, and took for a theme "American Freethinkers," which she introduced by an historical review of the growth of liberal ideas in this country.

This movement might be traced to two special sources: one to writings of Voltaire and Paine, the other to the philosophical writings of Germany. Their practical results were exhibited in the institutions and character of the society of to-day.

Particular stress was laid upon the importance of united effort and practical work among the liberals of this country. The individualistic and combative tendency of a certain class of liberals was contrasted with the more constructive and practical workers.

She contended that liberalism must be subject to ethical ideals and principles, and appealed to her countrymen to join hands with their liberal brethren of America in the effort to make real what had been the dream of the past and was the hope of the future,—the intellectual and moral freedom of humanity.

THE SILENCE THAT MISLEADS.

[The duty of the ablest and wisest minds to speak plainly and betimes on great public questions, especially those involving moral issues, and the practical evils that result when from mistaken considerations of prudence they hold their peace, are so well illustrated in the subjoined extract from Samuel J. May's Recollections of the Anti-Slavery Conflict, that it is pertinent to the times to reproduce it here.—Ed.]

Late in the year 1834, being on a visit to Boston, I spent several hours with Dr. Channing in earnest conversation upon Abolitionism and Abolitionists. My habitual reverence for him was such that I had always been apt to defer perhaps too readily to his opinions, or not to make a very stout defence of my own when they differed from his. But at the time to which I refer, I had become so thoroughly convinced of the truth of the essential doctrines of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and so earnestly engaged in the dissemination of them, that our conversation assumed, more than it had ever done, the character of a debate. He acknowledged the inestimable importance of the object we had in view. The evils of slavery, he assented, could not be over-stated. He allowed that removal to Africa ought not to be made a condition of the liberation of the enslaved. But he hesitated still to accept the doctrine of immediate emancipation. His principal objections, however, were alleged against the severity of our denunciations, the harshness of our epithets, the vehemence, heat, and excitement caused by the harangues at our meetings, and still more by Mr.

Garrison's Liberator. The Doctor dwelt upon these objections, which, if they were as well-founded as he assumed them to be, lay against only what was incidental, not an essential part of our movement. He dwelt upon them until I became impatient; and, forgetting for the moment my wonted deference, I broke out with not a little wrath of expression and manner.

"Dr. Channing," I said, "I am tired of these complaints. The cause of suffering humanity, the cause of our oppressed, crushed colored countrymen has called as loudly upon others as upon us Abolitionists. It was just as incumbent upon others as upon us to espouse it. We are not to blame that wiser and better men did not espouse it long ago. The cry of millions, suffering the most cruel bondage in our land, has been heard for half a century, and disregarded. The wise and prudent saw the terrible wrong, but thought it not wise and prudent to lift a finger for its correction. The priests and Levites beheld their robbed and wounded countrymen, and passed by on the other side. The children of Abraham hold their peace, and at last the very stones have cried out in abhorrence of this tremendous iniquity. You must not wonder if many of those who have been left to take up this great cause do not plead it in all that seemliness of phrase which the scholars and practised rhetoricians of our country might use. You must not expect them to speak and act with all the calmness and discretion that clergymen and statesmen might exhibit. But the scholars, the statesmen, the clergy did nothing, did not seem about to do anything; and for my part I thank God that at last any persons, be they who they may, have earnestly engaged in this cause; for no movement can be in vain. We Abolitionists are what we are, babes, sucklings, obscure men, silly women, publicans, sinners; and we must manage this matter just as might be expected of such persons as we are. It is unbecoming in abler men who stand by and do nothing, to complain of us because we do no better.

"Dr. Channing," I continued with increased earnestness, "it is not our fault that those who might have pleaded for the enslaved so much more wisely and eloquently, both with the pen and the living voice, have been silent. We are not to blame that you, who, more perhaps than any other man, might have so raised the voice of remonstrance that it should have been heard throughout the length and breadth of the land, have not so spoken. And now that inferior men have been impelled to speak and act against what you acknowledge to be an awful system of iniquity, it is not becoming in you to complain of us because we do it in an inferior style. Why, sir, have you not taken this matter in hand yourself? Why have you not spoken to the nation long ago, as you, better than any other one, could have spoken?"

At this point I bethought me to whom I was administering this rebuke, the man who stood among the highest of the great and good in our land, the man whose reputation for wisdom and sanctity had become world-wide, the man, too, who had ever treated me with the kindness of a father, and whom from my childhood I had been accustomed to revere more than any one living. I was almost overwhelmed with a sense of my temerity. His countenance showed that he was much moved. I could not suppose he would receive all I had said very graciously. I awaited his reply in painful expectation. The minutes seemed very long that elapsed before the silence was broken. Then, in a very subdued manner and in the kindest tones of his voice, he said: "Brother May, I acknowledge the justice of your reproof. I have been silent too long." Never shall I forget his words, look, whole appearance. I then and there saw the beauty, the magnanimity, the humility of a truly great Christian soul. He was exalted in my esteem more even than before.

The next spring, when I removed to Boston and became the general agent of the Anti Slavery Society, Dr. Channing was the first of the ministers there to call upon me and express sympathy with me in the great work to which I had come to devote myself. And during the whole fourteen months that I continued in that office he treated me with uniform kindness, and often made anxious inquiries about the phases of our attempted reform of the nation.

A PAIR OF CONSPIRATORS.

Alexander Solovieff, who attempted to assassinate the Emperor of Russia on the 14th of April last, has been found guilty, and has been sentenced to be hanged. He seemed to have acted upon his sole personal responsibility, and not to have been the agent of any conspiracy. In fact, he has been disowned even by the Revolutionary Committee, which has kindly announced its intention of letting the Czar entirely alone. All the madness of the time appears to have been concentrated in Solovieff, who upon his trial declined to be defended, acknowledged the deed for which he was condemned, and behaved in a firm though dignified manner. He will undoubtedly be hanged.

M. Blanqui, at Paris, the well-known agitator, has been more fortunate, having received a pardon. He was sentenced to death by the Government of National Defence in 1871. Having escaped, he was re-arrested March 17 of that year, and was not, therefore, engaged in the operations of the Commune, which began March 18. M. Blanqui has been imprisoned twenty-one times in as many different prisons, having always been a Radical of the Radicals. He is seventy-four years old. He figured in the revolutionary troubles of 1830, 1839, and 1848. He was first condemned to death as far back as 1840. It was he who founded the Société Republicaine Centrale, and for this he received a sentence of five years' imprisonment in 1861. He seems to be fated to die in his bed, for over and over again he has been in danger of a violent death at the hands of the law and has escaped it.

A good life of M. Louis Auguste Blanqui would be a remarkable publication. Here is a man of good education who has been perpetually compromised since 1827. He appears to have been equally opposed to all governments, whether royal, imperial, or democratic. As soon as he got out of one prison he organized a new conspiracy, and got into another. The chances are that he will soon be in prison again. Neither the happiness of the human race nor social advancement can result from the spasmodic exertions of men of the Blanqui and Solovieff type. While they have accomplished nothing desirable, they have not failed to do a great deal of mischief. It is true that a bad government gives them their opportunity, but there is no evidence that they would be peaceful and orderly under a good one. The bees would still be in their bonnets and the daggers in their hands.—N. Y. Tribune.

A PAGAN'S ARRAIGNMENT OF CHRISTIANITY.

Being myself but a poor scholar, it is difficult for me even to read European books, much less to understand the Western religion. Having, however, brought before one of high learning some matters concerning Christianity, of which I am about to speak hereafter, I have found his opinions thereon identical with my own. Christian missionaries say that Christianity is a perfect religion, the objects of which are to exhort men to the practice of virtue; to keep their hearts pure; to maintain that which is right, neither oppressing others nor permitting others to oppress them, and thus all men shall have the same freedom and exercise equal rights: so the power of this religion is great and boundless. The question to be asked is this: Is Christianity the true religion it professes to be? It is not necessary that, in a State where this religion prevails, all the people, from monarch to peasant, should be good and pious men; but there is one thing which I cannot clearly understand, so beg to ask you believers in Christianity for solution of the following problems: Looking through the list of nations of the whole world, I find England to be the country where Christianity flourishes most; so I shall take that country to illustrate my questions. If I ask you what sort of men the members of the cabinet of England are, you would probably answer that they are selected from the nobility on account of their extensive learning and great wisdom. Again, if I ask who the members of the two houses of Parliament are, your answer might be that they are also preëminent for learning and knowledge. There I should quite agree with both your answers, and at the same time I must believe that all of them, being Christians, are, of course, just and disinterested men. Well, do you remember the war between England and China, which took place more than twenty years ago? And do not you know the pretext alleged by the former country for this war? At that time Englishmen imported into China large quantities of opium produced in India, and the Chinese, finding this drug to be injurious to their fellow-countrymen, who unwisely smoked and used it in other ways, desired to put an end to the trade. England, enraged at this endeavor on the part of China, resolved to carry on the trade by force, and made war against the Chinese, which ended in favor of England, thus securing to themselves the importation of opium as before into the empire of China. It was natural and reasonable for the Chinese to have attempted to stop the import of opium, as they found it injurious to the people; while the conduct of the then members of the Cabinet and of the two Houses of Parliament of England is no less than enforcing upon a weaker nation a shameful trade in a poisonous drug. How can such conduct be said to be just and disinterested? It is unnecessary for me at this time to give particular accounts here of England's most cruel government in India, as that is a matter well-known to all the world. Alas! where is the virtue of which Christian missionaries preach? Can such conduct as that now instanced, causing injury to others in order to gain advantage for themselves, and the oppression of the weak by the strong, be tolerated by the people of such a great country as England, where Christianity is said to reign supreme? If we say, however, that the Christian religion has no power to control the actions of those who believe it, then we must, at the same time, declare it to be a barren religion, bearing no fruit and having no virtue whatsoever, while its power is both limited and confined. If this is so, how can we look upon it as the perfect one?—Japanese cor. in native paper.

I WAS AT A FEMALE SUFFRAGE MEETING the other day, says the editor of the London World, and heard, I am bound to say, a great deal of good sense and no shrieking. In the front row sat the Chinese Embassy, listening with a polite and patient attention which excited my wonder, until I learnt that the question of female representation is being agitated, if not in China, in Japan. A Japanese widow and householder has refused, in a letter full of excellent sense, to pay taxes, on the ground that she has no vote.—Boston Courier.

THE CHINESE AMBASSADOR, LI-FANG PAO, at Berlin, says that from the Chinese inscription on one of the vases found by Dr. Schliemann on Trojan soil it is proved that there was traffic between China and European boundaries about twelve hundred years before Christ. The gauze linen found by Dr. Schliemann in the vase was made in China. Li-Fang-pao contends that the Hyperboreans were Chinamen.—N. Y. Herald.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later till "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N.B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

SIFTINGS.

THERE ARE FEW who do not suffer, in some degree, all through life, from the errors of the well-intentioned, but incompetent, guides of their youth.

THE SOUTHERN Exodus differs from that of the Hebrew children in this: There is no promised land to be found,—not even the small patch of forty acres.

CONFIRMATION QUESTION.—Pastor: "So, my child, what do we call those who partake of the communion?" Child: "Communists." — German Exchange.

THAT WAS a high tribute to the influence of mothers which an enthusiastic admirer of Goethe paid the poet's mother: "Now do I understand how Goethe became the man he is."

THERE IS a good deal of inducement for those who like to be made much of to go to England at present. The reception they are giving to Talmage shows an evident demand over there for heroes.

THE FALL RIVER strike has been the great New England event of the week. Let the balance of justice be on which side it may, or whatever the issue, it is not easy to forget that the venture in all such contests is always unequal, both in respect to risks and sufferings.

AT THE LATE convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations at Baltimore, it was stated that the principal drawbacks upon the prosperity of these organizations were first, second, and third mortgages upon their buildings, and men at the head of the associations, who were elected twenty years ago or more to office in them and still hold the reins of power, having forgotten, apparently, that they are not now as young as they ever were.

THE COMPLAINT of Dr. Vandyke and others to the Brooklyn Presbytery, in respect to its action in acquitting Rev. Mr. Talmage, has received a formal reply. It is maintained that the best interests of religion, in the judgment of the presbytery, are to be served, not by continuing the agitation of the subject in the presbytery, and in the churches under its care in the city of Brooklyn, and in the churches at large, but by letting the whole matter pass out of mind.

THE DUNKARDS, known also as German Baptists, are said to be increasing in numbers and wealth. At a late conference in Pennsylvania, where they chiefly flourish, ten thousand of their number were present. Their clergymen receive no salaries, but support themselves by the labor of their own hands. The gospel is literally dispensed by them without money and price. In this respect, they appear to come nearer to primitive Christianity than the more ostentatious and opulent of the sects who aspire to this distinction.

A CHARMING OLD AGE.—One of the most beautiful things ever uttered by an old man is the following, which the poet Longfellow recently wrote to a friend: "To those who ask how I can write so many things that sound as if I were as happy as a boy, please say that there is in this neighborhood, or neighboring town, a pear-tree planted by Governor Endicott two hundred years ago, and that still bears fruit not to be distinguished from that of the young tree in flavor. I suppose the tree makes new wood every year, so that some part of it is always young. Perhaps that is the way with some men when they grow old; I hope it is so with me." — Herald of Health.

THE POPULAR prejudice against Spiritualism operates as a special convenience at times. An effort is being made, it is said, to obtain the release from prison of John S. Morton of Philadelphia, who was convicted of frauds as president of a railway in that city, on the ground that he was a Spiritualist and as a consequence irresponsible for his conduct. Poor Mr.

Kiddle, who wrote a book on Spiritualism after faithful service as school superintendent in New York for twenty-five years, was compelled for a similar reason to resign his office. It is strange that it is not more frequent to suspect those of unsound mind who believe in the Orthodox theories: certainly the cases are not altogether uncommon which look very much like it.

INTELLIGENCE has come to us of the death of a rather remarkable person. We refer to Morris Einstein, a noted freethinker, whose life closed a few days since at Titusville, Pa. He afforded a striking refutation of the popular notion of the Church that infidels are necessarily people of little moral value. Mr. Einstein did not seek to disguise his opinions. He was an uncompromising and earnest radical, a friend of THE INDEX and its editor and the Liberal League movement. Though as destitute as one could well be of faith, in the ordinary religious sense, he was a person of superior education and intelligence, and his character above reproach in the community in which he lived. A sketch of his life and funeral will be found in another part of this paper.

IT SEEMS THAT Roman Catholic priests are, after all, but mortal. The Rev. Father Hays, who is the principal of a parochial school in New York, never—well, hardly ever—loses his temper. A complaint was recently preferred against him in court for cruelly beating a little boy in his charge. There was a good deal of interest manifested in the case, and much sympathy among his brethren of the priesthood in the city, who attended in large numbers the trial. There was a great deal of squirming and subterfuge of various kinds to prove the innocence of the priest and attest the amiability of his disposition. A strong effort was made to convince the court that the marks of the beating upon the little boy had been produced by his mother; but this did not succeed. At last the priest was compelled to admit that he did lose his temper and whipped the boy more seriously than he ought. An indictment for assault was accordingly found against him.

THE MEETING at Tremont Temple in this city a few evenings since, to consider the condition of the negroes who have been flocking of late into Kansas, and what ought to be done for them, presented a subject which challenges the interest of all philanthropists and humane persons. But to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion in respect to the facts involved is not so easy as at first it might seem to be. The newspaper correspondents contradict each other, and even those upon whom it would seem most dependence ought to be placed for a true account of the case make different reports. There are thousands of people in the country who want to be on the right side in regard to the matter; and if they are not, it is because that position has not yet been made wholly plain to them. There are two or three things, nevertheless, which seem clear. The true home of the colored people in question is the South, if they can receive the protection there which they are entitled to as American citizens. It is with that section that all the associations of their lives have been formed. It is there that such knowledge and industrial training as they possess have been derived,—that they are likely to obtain at last a competence, and have the best promise for the future. It is the immediate duty of the government to see to it that the rights of these people are secured so far as they are despoiled of them. If this is neglected, as there is good reason to believe it is and has been, then they should have the fullest privilege of the highways and common carriers to escape from their persecution. It is incumbent upon all friends of justice and humanity to set themselves to work at once to obtain the true solution of this problem and act accordingly.

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 28 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

Free Religious Association.

TWELFTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, READ BY THE SECRETARY, AT THE MEETING IN BOSTON, MAY 30, 1879.

BY WM. J. POTTER.

We begin our Report with the frank statement that we have done, the past year, less active work than in any previous year since the Association came into existence. We published the usual report of the proceedings of the Annual Meeting of 1878 in pamphlet form, and we held in the autumn a convention in the city of Providence which seemed to be specially opportune and useful. But with these exceptions, nothing has appeared of our doings outside of our committee meetings.

As excuse for this inactivity, we might present the depressed state of our treasury throughout the year. At the last annual meeting, our treasurer's report showed a considerable balance of debt against the Association. The contributions received at that meeting, which it was hoped would liquidate the debt and provide also a goodly sum for the year's expenditures, were only sufficient just about to cover the expenses of the meeting, including the printing of the proceedings; so that early in the season we were left with the same amount of debt against us which we had to report last year. In this state of things, it certainly was not prudent to undertake any enterprises that would increase our financial liabilities. Quite recently, through special efforts of our treasurer and some members of the finance committee, sufficient contributions have been received from members and friends of the Association to pay off the debt, and to leave, as our treasurer happily reports, the balance, though it be a small one, on the right side.

But we cannot offer the condition of the treasury as the sole reason, though it may have been an adequate one, for our inactivity. We have not been, indeed, so inactive in deliberative council as it might appear by the result; and possibly it may prove to have been a year of "masterly inactivity," when the results are all unfolded, if in the future they shall be. The committee were early called to consider whether the time had not come for the Free Religious Association to enter upon a much larger work than it has hitherto attempted, looking in the direction of a wider application of its principles and a more effective organization of them in institutions. It would be premature to state here any results of deliberation which have not yet taken positive shape, or even to indicate what that shape may possibly be. But the matter may be appropriately referred to as showing that the committee have not been unmindful of the trusts confided to them, nor so idle as they may have outwardly seemed. They have been watchful of recent tendencies in liberal religious thought, and ready to undertake any new enterprises which may be in harmony with the principles of the Association, when it shall be made apparent that they are needed and that it is wise to enter upon them. In this condition of things, naturally the old instrumentalities of the Association have been less urged; and, in particular, the course of lectures in Boston, which for a number of years has been conducted by us, and which requires a considerable outlay of money, by special subscription, beyond what is received from the sale of tickets, it was thought might as well be suspended for the present season.

The intimations are not few that there is a growing conviction among persons of free religious sentiments in favor of some more efficient organization of their ideas than has hitherto been attempted on any large scale,—an organization not simply for the luxury of speculative discussion, but for taking hold of the practical, social, philanthropic, and educational problems of the day, where these problems concern man's highest interests. The Free Religious Association has always urged the supreme importance of this practical, humanitarian side of religion. It has pleaded for the emancipation of the power of religion from enthrallment to the authority of dogma and ecclesiasticism, to the very end that this power might be set at work freely, with all its resources, for the benefit of humanity. It is nothing new, therefore, for the Association to take the ground that religion should be so organized as directly to concern itself with these pressing social problems. The only thing new in the matter is the attempt by the Association, if attempt there shall be, to institute methods of action which shall directly encourage and foster more substantial organization in this direction. Hitherto the Association has sought only to affect public opinion toward this end by discussions on its platform and in its publications. But now the question is presented, Shall the Association adopt methods which shall serve to furnish guidance and direction, if not more substantial aid, to liberal local communities where the elements seem ready for organized action? And this is a question not to be answered hastily either in the affirmative or the negative. It is a question that deserves the most serious consideration. On the one hand liberty—the liberty of the local society and its individual members—is to be secured beyond all hazards of interference from what may seem like an assertion of authority in any central association. On the other hand, is not some such method of helpful relationship and aid toward these local nuclei of liberal religious organizations, some method at least for supplying a demand which is becoming every year more and more apparent, absolutely necessary, if the Association can expect to see any wide-spread and permanent establishment of its principles? This report does not attempt to answer these questions, but only to say that these are the important questions now before us, and to bring them to the attention of members of the Association as requiring their most thoughtful deliberation. Provision has been made for the consideration of them in one of the sessions of the Convention to-morrow, under the subject, "The Practical Needs of Free Religion."

And here we may add that the objection sometimes raised that free religion is too vague to be capable of practical organization may be answered by pointing to at least three local societies where it is very efficiently organized,—namely, the Free Congregational Society at Florence, Mass., the Free Religious Society at Providence, R.I., and the Society for Ethical Culture in the city of New York. Other societies might be named which are now, perhaps, conducted quite as fully on the principles of free religion, but they have been, and nominally may still be, Christian churches, and hence it may be claimed that they live on the vitality of their Christian traditions. But these three began their existence without even a nominal connection with any form of creed or church. The first named, the society at Florence, has existed many years, and has had an unusually prosperous career. For a considerable period it was the only religious organization in the place, and may still, perhaps, be reckoned as the leading one. Its beneficent influence on the community has been acknowledged by Orthodox believers. It maintains not only a Sunday meeting for hearing discourses from chosen speakers and a Sunday-school for giving instruction to the young, but has well-appointed agencies for social and benevolent work adapted to the local needs. It has a fine and spacious building for its use, and is, in fact, so well organized that this past year it has decided to suspend the practice of having a resident speaker as leader, and for the present to continue the operations of the society by depending largely on the talent and resource which have been cultivated in the membership of the society itself. For several months this plan has been adopted, and still all branches of the society are, we understand, in successful activity. "The Free Religious Society" at Providence began some six or seven years ago. Until this last year it only sought to hold Sunday meetings, securing the best speakers that were available. But within the last year it has summoned to its aid a resident speaker, has organized, under his auspices, a Sunday-school in which all ages are happily mingled together, and is showing an earnestness of purpose which promises an enlarging and permanent success. "The Society for Ethical Culture" in New York, of which our President, Felix Adler, is the founder and leader, has had as yet but a brief career, but has already shown itself a power in that great city. Aside from its Sunday work, when Mr. Adler addresses a great congregation of people, it has instituted several subordinate agencies, educational and charitable, which take direct practical hold of the social problems of the hour and aim at the moral and physical elevation of the ignorant and degraded classes of the population. The good fame of this work is already getting abroad through the public press and private speech, and our President must allow us to speak of it here in his presence for the encouragement and guidance of others. With such illustrations of success as these three societies, with their very different local conditions, offer us, let it not be said that free religion is incapable of social organization for educational and humanitarian work. The organization will come in some form—not necessarily always in the same form—wherever free religious ideas have taken adequate root, as soon as the conviction that something ought to be done is accompanied by the necessary individual enthusiasm and self-consecration to do it.

Nor is there any occasion for discouragement because free religious ideas seem to take root slowly. When we consider how the ground was preoccupied with traditional faiths that were the growth of centuries, the wonder rather is that these faiths are being displaced so rapidly, and that even in the dozen years since this Association was organized we can note the marked advance of its principles. Ideas that were novel to the public mind twelve years ago—as the union of persons of Hebrew and Christian antecedents in one religious association, and the common origin and kinship of religions—have now become comparatively familiar thoughts. The very position of this Association, outside of all the special religions, has raised new issues in the sphere of religious thought, and forced theological problems upon a new platform. And the practical effect is already evident in at least one denomination—the Unitarian. We may certainly take courage by the discouragement of those opposed to us. Rev. Dr. Eliot, of St. Louis, one of the zealous defenders of original Unitarianism, has recently published a noteworthy letter in which he laments the evident tendencies (and he notes several things in proof) of the Unitarian body, particularly in the Western States, away from the special authority of Jesus and of all historical revelation towards the ground of free religion. He and others thus raise their voices in warning to their brethren; but to us it is a stimulating summons to renewed faith and effort in our cause.

It has been suggested from time to time, that greater interest and effectiveness might be given to our conventions by the presentation of resolutions to be discussed and voted upon. The committee recommend that the adoption of this method be one of the points to be specially considered at the business meeting this year.

We cannot close this report without referring to the loss which death has again inflicted upon our ranks. Last year John Weiss withdrew from the Board of Directors, where he had held a place for several years,—the disease even then creeping upon him which has since culminated in his death. Mr. Weiss was one of the most inspiring among the speakers at the first public meeting out of which this Association grew. He was ready for the new departure. And from that time until disabled by his fatal sickness, he never hesitated to serve the Association and its objects with his brilliant pen and his matchless magnetic speech. He had a rare combination of powers, making him a marked and exceptional workman, and we can but hold his work in grateful remembrance. One of the finest specimens of his literary work which he has left in print is the paper on "Religion and Science" which he contributed to the volume of essays entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Religion published by this Association. He became, indeed, one of the most valiant and trenchant spokesmen which the free religious movement has had,—showing, perhaps, little mercy in tearing away the merely traditional and ecclesiastical coverings of a formal piety, but strong and tender for building up a vital and present religion in America, adequate for every moral and spiritual emergency.

It comes to our hearts and to our lips to mention here another standard-bearer of liberty who has been released from his earthly service this very week, and whom all lovers of humanity on two hemispheres are now naming with honor and reverence,—William Lloyd Garrison. He earned the laurels which he has carried down to his grave in another conflict than that in which we here are now engaged, yet akin to it; for while, with a prophet's faith and a martyr's courage, he was working for the emancipation of the American slaves, he was at the same time unconsciously emancipating thousands of minds from the yoke of bondage to creeds and churches. The Liberator was the school in which many young minds in this country were first taught to question the infallible authority of the Bible and the official sacredness of the Church and the clergy. It was a school in which all religious professions and alleged revelations were brought to the practical test of justice and humanity. Thus Mr. Garrison became the apostle of mental freedom no less than physical, and helped greatly to prepare the way for free religion. Though not officially connected with this Association, he was a regular attendant at its annual meetings, and ill-health alone prevented his frequent speech from our platform. His sympathies were warmly enlisted in our favor,—his only regret, perhaps, being that the Association was not more zealously propagandist in its methods. Two or three years ago the executive committee proposed to elect him a Vice-President to fill a vacancy; but while appreciating the honor he declined to accept it, chiefly because his keen conscience would not allow him to accept an office which seemed to him only honorary. Would that America were full of such free religious believers and workers as he!

We may also fittingly mention here our deep regrets that our recent President, Octavius B. Frothingham, who for eleven years so ably led this Association, has been compelled by broken health to retire from his long service for rational and liberal religion in New York, and to seek rest and recreation abroad. Our best wishes go with him! And we hope and trust that this wise temporary retirement is only to recruit his strength for fresh service, so that he may come back to complete his admirable life-work with the rich fruit of the autumn of his years.

Thus, one after another, the veterans in the service, generals and soldiers, by death or disability are dropping from the ranks. But the memory of their valor summons the young as with a bugle-call to fill the vacant places, so that the battle may not cease till victory is won.

ADRIPT FOR HERESY.

THE TRIAL OF ORION CLEMENS BEFORE THE SESSION OF WESTMINSTER CHURCH.—THE FINDING OF THE ECCLIASTICAL COURT AND THE SENTENCE AS PRONOUNCED.

On the 5th inst. Orion Clemens, a well-known attorney-at-law of this city, and a brother of Mark Twain, the noted humorist, delivered a lecture at Red Ribbon Hall in this city, the title of which was "Man the Architect of Our Religion." The sentiments of the lecture were far different from the Orthodox teachings of the church of which he was a member,—the Presbyterian,—and he was cited before the session of that church to answer the charge of heresy, he being a member of the Westminster congregation of this city, of which Dr. Craig is pastor.

The prominence of the characters participating, and the fact that the matter originated from a lecture delivered in a public hall, has given the trial more than ordinary prominence; and below we give the full text of the proceeding, the conclusion of the court, and the final sentence of excommunication:—

In the matter of Orion Clemens:—

Citation.

TO ORION CLEMENS:—

You are hereby cited to be and appear before the session of the First Westminster Church of Keokuk, at the pastor's study of said church, on Saturday, May —, 1879, at 3 o'clock P.M., then and there to answer to the charge preferred against you of common fame, a copy of which charge, with the specifications under it and with the proofs appended to it, is herewith delivered to you in order that the matter may be heard and decided.

By order of the session.

P. T. LOMAX,
Clerk of Session.

KEOKUK, May 6, 1879.

I hereby accept due service of the above citation, and waive time for my appearance thereto; and I desire that the matter of said charge and specifications be immediately heard and decided.

ORION CLEMENS.

KEOKUK, May 6, 1879.

Copy of Charge and Specifications.

I. Common fame charges Orion Clemens, a member of the First Westminster Presbyterian Church of the city of Keokuk, with having publicly delivered at Red Ribbon Hall, in said city, on Monday evening, May 5, 1879, a lecture in writing, wherein he disavowed the divinity of the Christian religion, and attributed it wholly to man.

Specification 1.—In that he denies in said lecture the presence of the supernatural in the Old Testament Scriptures.

P. T. LOMAX,
Clerk of Session.

Trial accused Wednesday evening, May 7, Rev. W. G. Craig presiding, Geo. B. Smyth prosecutor. P. T. Lomax, clerk of the session, wrote down the minutes of the testimony.

J. H. Westcott and Wm. J. Fulton sworn as witnesses.

J. H. Westcott testified as follows, in answer to interrogatories by the prosecutor:—

I was present at the lecture of Mr. Clemens on the evening of 5th of May in Red Ribbon Hall. Mr. Clemens enunciated the opinion that Christianity was of human and not of divine origin. I understood him to deny the supernatural in the Old Testament Scriptures. The view he held of Abraham was that he was an idolator, as the Canaanites were. In the sense that the fundamental principles of the Bible originated with man, he denied the inspiration of the Scriptures. The view he adopted as to Abraham's inspiration was that it was not a divine call. He thought that Abraham planted a tree out of which to form an idol to be worshipped by himself. He held that Abraham had the Canaanitish worship, and that alone.

Cross-examined by Accused.

Question.—In regard to a spirit existing in the object worshipped, alluded to in your evidence just given, was it not in the stone, and not in the tree?

Answer.—I understood it to be in both; that in the tree there was a development toward the spiritual; that Abraham, in planting the tree, had the ultimate idea in view of worshipping God in the tree.

Question.—Was not the idea of Abraham in planting the tree, and at the same time calling upon the name of the Lord, "the Everlasting God, intended as an act of dedication of the tree to the purpose of afterward being converted into an idol by cutting symbols upon the stem?

Answer.—I understood that the tree was ultimately to be an idol.

W. J. Fulton testified:—

I was at the lecture, and heard it delivered. I did not understand Mr. Clemens to state anything generally in regard to the inspiration of the Old Testament Scriptures. He impliedly stated that the Old Testament was not supernatural, save that he seemed to recognize that Moses on Sinai was in communication with God. In regard to Abraham's faith and worship, he argued that he was an idolator, as other Phenicians were, from profane and sacred history.

The accused admitted before the session that the proofs under the specifications were in his own handwriting, and were furnished the committee, and he was willing that they should be submitted as evidence under said specifications.

As to charge II., accused said that he did not wish witnesses produced under specification 1st, and waived their production. He said that he could not recognize Christ as co-equal with God. Christ's mission on earth he regarded a great beneficence, but he regarded him as of human origin; that the construction he gave to the sacrifice of Christ on the cross was this: That the present idea of the Christian world of the efficacy of the crucifixion is a growth from and a modification of the ancient Jews' and others' belief in and practice of human sacrifices.

In regard to the resurrection of Christ, he said he thought that the belief in that resurrection occurred from the traditions concerning Christ's life not having been written down until perhaps a century after his death.

As to the historical fact of the resurrection, the statement is a traditional statement, and without sufficient evidence to sustain it as a historical fact. He could not say that he believed it. It stood unproved to his mind.

As to the sanctity of the Sabbath day, he thought the Sabbath ought to be observed, but that it was not sacred in the view that it is derived from heaven. It is not binding to the extent that it would be if given of God; and yet it is a day which ought to be observed as a day of rest, and for decency's sake, and for propriety's sake, and for custom's sake.

Question by Moderator.—Did you feel impelled by a sense of duty and privilege to give public utterance to these views?

Answer.—Yes. I consider it the duty of every man to think soberly upon these subjects, to make up his views satisfactorily to himself, and then express them to others, in order that if he be in error he may be corrected and the truth reached through free, full, and open discussion.

Question by same.—Were you earnestly counselled and repeatedly besought by the session not to give utterance to these views?

Answer.—I was.

Question by same.—Do you understand the views enunciated in your lecture and freely expressed here to be directly contrary to the fundamental teachings of the Presbyterian Church?

Answer.—I do.

Question by same.—Have we, the session, according to our best ability, sought to resolve your doubts?

Answer.—You have sought to resolve my doubts. You will have to judge as to best of your ability.

By the Moderator.—That is a correct answer.

Notice of Excommunication.

KEOKUK, Iowa, May 9, 1879.

MR. ORION CLEMENS:

Dear Sir,—I have to inform you that the session on Wednesday evening last unanimously found you guilty under the charges tabled against you, and their sentence was that you should therefor be excommunicated from the church, and said excommunication be pronounced at morning service on Sabbath next.

Very respectfully, P. T. LOMAX,
Clerk of Session.

The Excommunication.

At the morning service yesterday in the First Westminster Presbyterian Church, Rev. Dr. Craig preached a sermon adapted to the occasion, after which he gave a short narration of the steps that had been taken with the accused, showed the authority of the Church to cast out unworthy members, from Matt. xviii., 15, 16, 17, 18; 1 Cor. v. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5; explained the nature, use, and consequences of this censure; warned the people to avoid all unnecessary intercourse with the person about to be cast out, as they might be contaminated with his opinions, and then said:—

"WHEREAS, Orion Clemens hath been, by sufficient proof, convicted of heresy, and, after much admonition and prayer, obstinately refuseth to hear the church, and hath manifested no evidence of repentance; therefore, in the name and by the authority of the Lord Jesus Christ, I pronounce him to be excluded from the communion of the church."—Keokuk Constitution, May 12.

LESSING'S THEOLOGICAL CONCLUSIONS.

Lessing refused to surrender Christianity, on proof of error in its first teachers, uncertainty in its reported miracles, contradictions in its early literature, misapplication of Messianic prophecies. All these he regards as but the external accidents, the transitory media, of the religion, constituting, it may be, its support in one age and its weakness in another. They do not belong to its inner essence, in which alone the real evidence of spiritual truth is found; and he who detects anything amiss with them may even render a service by driving men from sham proofs, that really persuade no one, to true ones that lie at the heart of things. Religious doctrine cannot be deduced from mere historical facts without a μετάβασις εἰς ἄλλο γένος vitiating the whole process. Facts indeed may become the proper ground of moral and spiritual faith; but then they must be facts which come over again and again, and betray an element that is permanent and eternal; which form part of the experience and consciousness of humanity, and ally themselves with the Divine by not losing their presence in the world. But unrepeated facts, which limit themselves to a moment, which are the incidents of a single personality, and are left behind quite insulated in the past, show—were it only by your not expecting them again—that they are detached from the persistent and essential life of the universe and humanity. They are but once and away; and least of all, therefore, can testify of the untransitory and ever-living. The real can teach us only so far as it has an ideal kernel, redeeming it from the character of a solitary phenomenon. Among the various expositions and applications of this favorite theme of Lessing's, we select the following sentences from his Axiomata:—

1. "The Bible evidently contains more than belongs to religion."
2. "That in this 'more' the Bible is still infallible, is mere hypothesis."
3. "The letter is not the spirit, and the Bible is not the religion."
4. "The objections therefore against the letter and against the Bible are not on that account objections against the spirit and against the religion."
5. "Moreover there was a religion ere there was a Bible."
6. "Christianity was in being before Evangelists and Apostles had written. Some time elapsed before the first of them wrote, and a very considerable time before the whole canon was constituted."
7. "However much, therefore, may depend on these writings, it is impossible that the whole truth of the Christian religion can rest upon them."
8. "If there was a period during which, diffused as the Christian religion already was, and many as were the souls filled already with its power, still not a letter had yet been written of the records which have come down to us, then it must be also possible for all the writings of Evangelists and Apostles to perish, yet the religion taught by them still to subsist."
9. "The religion is not true because Evangelists and Apostles taught it; but they taught it because it is true."
10. "Its interior truth must furnish the interpretation of the writings it has handed down; and no writings handed down can give it interior truth, if it has none."

In his controversy with Göze, he illustrates this distinction between the essence and the historical form of Christianity, by a parable to the following effect: A wise king of a great realm built a palace of immense size and very peculiar architecture. About this structure, there came from the very first a foolish strife to be carried on, especially among reputed connoisseurs,—people, that is, who had least looked into the interior. This strife was not about the palace itself, but about various old ground-plans of it, and drawings of the same, very difficult to make out. Once, when the watchmen cried out "Fire," these connoisseurs, instead of running to help, snatched up their plans, and, instead of putting out the fire on the spot, kept standing with their plans in hand, making a hubbub all the while, and squabbling about whether this was the spot on fire, and that the place to put it out. Happily, the safety of the palace did not depend on these busy wranglers, for it was not on fire at all; the watchmen had been frightened by the northern lights, and mistaken them for fire. It is impossible to convey by a clearer image Lessing's feeling that a Christianity once incorporated in the very substance of history and civilization, seated deep in human sentiment and thought, and developed into literature, law, and life, subsists independently of critical questions, and is with us, not as the contingent vapor that a wind may rise to blow away, but as the cloud that has dropped its rain and mingled with the root of things.—James Martineau.

WERE FRANKLIN AND WASHINGTON CHRISTIANS?

Rev. Mr. McClure's lecture on Henry Wilson was a very fine effort, but the good brother was a little "off" when he referred to Benjamin Franklin as a Christian. Old Ben. paid more attention to science than to religion proper, but he was about as much of a Christian as Thomas Jefferson or Thomas Paine!

Rev. Dr. Priestley, whose Christianity will not be disputed, and who knew Franklin intimately, in his Autobiography says: "It is much to be lamented that a man of Franklin's general good character and great influence should have been an unbeliever in Christianity, and also to have done so much as he did to make others unbelievers." Parton, in his Life of Franklin, Vol. I., page 319, says: "In conversation with familiar friends, he [Franklin] called himself a deist or theist"; and that Franklin was not a Christian, is, we think, established beyond all question.

But our good brother also made, as we think, an equally grievous mistake in attempting to claim Washington as a Christian. This is what the Orthodoxy have been trying to do for the last three-quarters of a century; and as, during that time, a great many stories as to Washington's alleged Christianity have been floating around among the Orthodox papers, and embellished and revamped from time to time to give them an air of freshness and reliability, and as many of these stories have been finally incorporated in some of the Christian biographies and histories which this country has produced, it is not surprising that a great many very well-informed men—especially those to whom the wish is the father to the thought—honestly suppose that General Washington was "sound on the creeds" and a good Christian; but, unfortunately for those who would like to believe these stories, they are not sustained by the most authentic history. Dr. Abercrombie, rector of the Episcopal church in Philadelphia which Washington when President attended, says that on occasions when the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered, Washington was never known to stay through the ceremony and participate in the rite, and Dr. Abercrombie's own words are that "Washington was a deist." It is possible that some of the religious newspapers and Christian historians of this century know more about Washington's religious opinions than his own pastor did, but it is hardly probable!

But good, honest, old Thomas Jefferson, who enjoyed the most intimate relation with Washington for years, ought to be pretty good authority as to the latter's views on religion. Upon this subject, Mr. Jefferson, in his journal of the year 1800 (Jefferson's Works, Vol. IV., p. 572), says:—

"Dr. Rush told me he had it from Asa Green, that when the clergy addressed General Washington on his departure from the government, it was observed in their consultation that he had never, on any occasion, said a word to the public which showed a belief in the Christian religion, and they thought they should so pen their addresses as to force him at length to disclose publicly whether he was a Christian or not. However, he observed, the old fox was too cunning for them. He answered every article of their address particularly, except that, which he passed over without notice. Rush observes he (Washington) never did say a word on the subject in any of his public papers, except in his valedictory letters to the governors of the States when he resigned his commission in the army, wherein he speaks of the benign influence of the Christian religion. I know that Governor Morris, who claimed to be in his secrets and believed himself to be so, has often told me that General Washington believed no more in that system (Christianity) than he did."

Rev. Dr. Wilson, an eminent Episcopal clergyman of Albany, New York, nearly half a century ago published an article in the Daily Advertiser of that city, of October 29, 1831, in which, after a most thorough investigation of Washington's religious belief, he is compelled to make this confession:—

"I have perused every line that Washington ever gave to the public, and I do not find one impression in which he pledges himself as a professor of Christianity. I think any man who will candidly do as I have done will come to the conclusion that he was a deist and nothing more."

It is worthy of note in this connection that Washington while President signed a treaty between our government and Tripoli in which it was solemnly declared that "the government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion!"

As the Orthodoxy are being crowded pretty closely these days, it is perhaps not to be wondered at that they should pick out as many of the good and beloved men of the past as possible, and try to figure it out that they were Christians; but we respectfully submit that the most authentic historical accounts that we have conclusively refute the claim that either Franklin or Washington was a believer in Christianity!

Indeed, it is a fact which cannot be successfully contradicted, that the more prominent of the Revolutionary statesmen, generally, were unbelievers or infidels!—Duluth (Minn.) Tribune.

THE STUDENTS AT HARVARD.

It would seem President Eliot has not the fullest confidence in the entire moral integrity of the young men whom he is charged to educate in ethics and substantial knowledge, nor hardly any in that of the physicians as a class. At the dinner of the Massachusetts Medical Society, last week, he remarked that he wanted to call the attention of the doctors to a peculiar disease among the students at Harvard. Twenty-one per cent. of the men in the senior class were so affected with diseases in the throat and lungs that it was impossible for them to go to prayers; so the doctors of the Massachusetts Medical Society had certified. [Laughter.] Among the curious facts in connection with this disease was that it had increased from ten per cent. in the freshman class to twenty-one per cent. in the senior class, which showed how unhealthy the college course must be in this respect. [Laughter.] It was a disease which existed only a few moments in each day. It did not prevent the students from going to breakfast even when the prayer-bell was ringing, nor from going to the theatre almost every night in the week. [Laughter.] Some of them were the most athletic men in the college, and sang in the Glee Club while thus affected. These diseases were all certified to by members of the Massachusetts Medical Society; the college took no other certificates. [Laughter and applause.] "I don't know," said the speaker seriously, "any greater harm a physician can do a young man between eighteen and twenty-one than to give him a false excuse for avoiding a duty." [Applause.] Having thus administered the needed rebuke, President Eliot is further reported: The speaker alluded to the wonderful lack of knowledge or practice of the laws of hygiene among the students as they come to college. They did not know enough to keep their windows open at night, they did not know enough to use plenty of soap and water, they utterly disregarded all rules of diet, and fresh air was something they had not learned to drink. [Applause and laughter.] The members of the medical profession should be instructors in the laws of health in every family in which they practiced. Strange to say, there was a marked superiority in physique among the students who came from the city over those who came from the country. There were moral diseases in the community to which the medical profession could devote their attention. The fear of hell-fire and the undying worm did not have a strong restraining influence, as they once did. [Laughter.] Science, and particularly medical science, was supplying a substitute for that influence, and he thought the members of the profession should dwell upon what might be called the scientific demonstrable evil consequences of sin. They could drive this lesson home as no other profession could.—Commonwealth.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

The reform movement in higher education which Harvard University began about ten years ago, and has since been vigorously pushing, has been watched with interest, not only by the graduates and friends of that institution, but by the country at large. Whether we shall have on this side of the Atlantic a university worthy to rank with those of Europe, is a problem in which the nation is interested; and it is this problem which is now undergoing solution at Cambridge. The United States has long boasted of having the best common-school system in the world. It certainly has more than its share of "colleges" and "universities"; but this fact ceases to be a source of national vanity when it is remembered that these high-sounding names are assumed by hundreds of institutions which are merely country academies. Dr. Johnson's remark that Oxford ought to be an institution of learning, since everybody took some there and nobody brought any away, might apply to many of them with as much truth as wit. Nor is there any lack of institutions, excellent and useful of their kind, having the various professional schools and departments which are essential to the organization of a university. But a university in the higher sense of the word, in the meaning which it has in England, Germany, and other continental countries, is something which Americans have yet to look forward to in their own country. This fact and its importance have been recognized by the leaders of the Harvard movement, and Cambridge bids fair to become the seat of our future university.

The revolution in the system of education which has already taken place at Harvard, and is still going on, may be said to date from the accession of Charles W. Eliot to the presidency. At any rate, almost, if not quite, all of the important changes wrought have been made during his administration. For more than a quarter of a century prior to his election, the stereotyped requirements for admission and the inelastic curriculum of college studies remained substantially the same. The first important step in defiance of the traditional conservatism of the institution was the placing, in 1868, of this comparatively young and unknown man at the head of the university. Whatever other qualifications might be required in a president, age and renown had previously been deemed indispensable. With his advanced views and vigorous intellect, President Eliot was quick to see the radical defects of the firmly rooted system of education which he had been chosen to administer, and, what is better, he showed no lack of courage in urging that the knife be used with a strong nerve for their removal. Harvard graduates of a dozen or more years' standing are now experiencing the evils of a college course which left them no choice of studies,—of an inflexible system which, during four years, was the same for all students, without reference to the widely varying differences of their mental faculties, tastes, wants, and future courses in life. The studies prescribed by the college were then the rule; the exceedingly few elective branches were but rare exceptions. This policy has been wisely revolutionized, and the course of study has been made to adapt itself, within easy limits, to the student, instead of the student to the course of study....

The spirit of progress and improvement has pervaded every part of the system of instruction. The modification in the requirements for admission to the college, the expansion of the courses of study, the marked improvement in the system of final examinations, the institution of honors and of new degrees, the opportunities for study extended to graduates,—these are but a part of the general movement which is rapidly transforming Harvard from a mere college into a university, in reality as well as in name. This revolution has been attended with an unprecedented increase in the number of students and instructors, and in the educational equipment and financial resources of the university.—N. Y. Times.

CO-OPERATION: WHY IT IS NEEDED.

Strikes, like wars, are evils; but as society has not yet crystallized into such decent conditions as to dispense with them, they must be tolerated for the time being.

The laws, written and unwritten, which control nations in their murderous conflicts have been formulated in a rude way for centuries, and the rights of the belligerents to wage the same within certain stipulated moral boundaries without external interference are somewhat clearly defined.

Not so, however, where conflicts have arisen between different classes of the same nationalities, as masters and slaves, employer and employé, and in many instances and ages between communicants of the popular religion and the so-called schismatics of the minority.

The famous Dred Scott decision had the great merits of conclusion and precision. Its utterance that "black men had no rights that white men were bound to respect," "had no uncertain sound," and, like its metaphorical antetype, it promptly showed the way to battle.

Until the advent of this century, it would seem that labor had no rights which capital was bound to respect. Although this was never formulated with the singular clearness of Judge Taney's apothegm, it had nevertheless become solidly crystallized into the common law.

More than that, the whole power of governments was held in constant readiness to crush work and workers by legislative enactments, and to promptly stamp out any avowal of national or political rights by the working classes.

Hume, the historian, tells us that in the reign of Edward III., of England, which began in 1327, "a reaper in the first week of August was not allowed over two pence a day, in the second week a third more; a master carpenter was limited through the year to three pence a day; a common carpenter to two pence. The pay of a common soldier was six pence a day." A few years previous, government had "fixed" farmers' prices at seven pence half-penny for a fat goose; three pence for a fat hen; three pence for two chickens and three pence for four pigeons; so the poor devil who had worked from sun to sun through the week could buy with his six days' wages of twelve pence a goose (seven pence half-penny), a hen (three pence), and have a penny and a half left for clothes, house rent, fuel, etc.

Even so late as the time of David Hume, who died only a century ago, that distinguished economist, whose utterances are deemed oracular and reverently quoted by our college professors, taught that the only sure way to provide for our laboring classes was to carefully nurture the landed proprietors. A little later his teachings were softened into the apothegm which, if we are correctly informed, was used as a copy for pupils to practise writing with in the schools: "Take care of the rich, and the rich will take care of the poor."

The wisdom and equity of such teaching were at that time never questioned, as there were then really no rich and no poor in the sense now applied to those terms. Manufacturers were comparatively unknown; the term servant was never applied to white people, assistants from outside the family being termed help. They ate at the same table, attended the same church, sat in the same pew, and frequently married the sons and daughters of their employers.

But with the advent of steam and improved machinery come important changes. Spinning jennies and power looms threw thousands of the old wheels and hand looms into the garrets, and farmers' daughters sought work in the newly constructed factories.

In the favorite business of this town, hat machines, run by one person, did the work of twenty-five, thus throwing twenty-five out of business, which of course glutted the labor market and depressed wages. This is mentioned as a sample of the effects throughout the whole curriculum of manufactures.

Soon unrest supplanted contentment; trust in employers was superseded by suspicion, and to-day a large and growing class of workers are as arrogantly denying to capital any rights which labor is bound to respect as, half a century ago, the converse of the proposition was supported by the moneyed classes.

CO-OPERATION teaches that both have their rights, but that, other things being equal, the most perfect societal conditions will accrue when every worker shall be his own capitalist, and not abjectly beg of his fellow-men the privileges to enjoy the primeval curse of earning his daily bread by the sweat of his brow. The next article of this series will be on strikes—their causes and their cure.—Orange (N.J.) Journal, June 21.

THE MODERN DISCIPLES.

A New York Episcopal bishop anonymously advertised a few weeks ago for five young clergymen to perform missionary service in his diocese on certain self-denying conditions. They would receive their board and $150 a year for clothing and other conveniences. They must be well educated, sound in mind and body, users of no artificial stimulants or narcotics, men of good practical sense,—and the possession of these qualifications must be sufficiently certified to. The bishop's meagre offer drew forth ridicule and sharp criticisms from various quarters, and it was called either an affront or a joke upon the ministry. Whereupon the bishop reveals himself to be Dr. Huntington of the Central New York diocese, and he deals out a little wholesome sarcasm at the expense of his critics. He remarks, in the first place, that he does not create the conditions that he named, nor even express his sympathy with them, nor propose to ask or urge any man to comply with them; he only mentions them as existing and unavoidable. Speaking of himself in the third person, he continues, "His gross sin is that he imagines that out of hundreds who have foregone the world for the kingdom of heaven, and who preach sermons, and sing hymns about cross-bearers and marching soldiers and a suffering sainthood and the glories of self-renunciation, there may possibly be five, only five, who would not count a very abstemious ministry in one of our Middle States intolerable, or the offer of it either an affront or 'a joke.' This appears to be what we have come to just after Lent, with the columns of religious journals teeming with complacent accounts of 'large attendance,' and before the Easter perfumes and harmonies have been lost in the air. It is something for our young men, postulants and candidates in our theological schools, to consider. If one of them should happen, rising from the study of the Gospels and Epistles or the records of the ages of faith, to dream of following his Lord on plain food, in plain clothes, having not where to lay his head on any pillow of his own, 'well educated' and yet not well lodged, say half as well educated as the Pattersons and Selwyns and Hebers, with no fine-flavored coffee, and no tobacco at all, what an idiot he would be! The days of great sacrifices and great honors, young man, are gone by. Christian heroism is out of fashion. Be anything but a zealot. There are not many foxes for you to chase in America; but after you have recited your Pearson and Hooker, take down your list of 'good parishes,' light your pipe, and discuss with your companions the comparative salaries, the social refinements, snug rectories, and other material advantages. If you hear of a bishop who wants the other style of man, laugh at him.... Take good care, first of all, of your own independence and comfort, and then of your prospective official prerogative. Make early arrangements for matrimony and settling down. Resent any expectation that you are to be more sparing of yourself than the children of the world whom you are going to convert; and preach the crucifixion of eighteen centuries ago."—Springfield Republican, June 14.

AMERICAN CATHOLICITY.

AN ENGLISH OPINION OF ITS RECENT TROUBLES AND ITS FUTURE PROSPECTS.

It is opportune that the Church of Rome in the United States should succeed in attracting the favorable attention of the public. Within the last three months, that church sustained a blow which would have damaged a less sound and well-organized body. Archbishop Purcell of Cincinnati, an aged and much-esteemed prelate, and his brother the Very Rev. Edward Purcell, have been found guilty of grievous errors. For many years the archbishop had been in the habit of receiving money on deposit, and thousands of his flock trusted him with their savings. He has had to confess his inability, owing to unforeseen circumstances, to pay interest on these deposits, and he has appealed to Protestants as well as to professors of his own faith for pecuniary aid. His accounts have been investigated, with the result of showing that his liabilities amount to upward of $4,000,000, and that his creditors number three thousand. No other charge than that of unjustifiable recklessness is brought against the archbishop and his brother, not a single dollar having been expended upon themselves personally. What he did was to take all the money offered to him, to keep no accounts, and to expend whatever he had in hand in paying priests, building schools and churches, and in advancing the spiritual interests of his diocese. The archbishop innocently professes to see no moral harm in this. Indeed, he tells a pathetic story of his struggles with the world and of his own good intentions. He was born of parents who had to stint themselves in order to educate him. When he was made Bishop of Cincinnati he was so poor that he had to borrow $300 in order to travel to his see, along with two or three students and his servants. He had to continue borrowing money in order to provide the requirements of his diocese, and he was so much respected that he had no difficulty in getting whatever sums he chose to accept. Utterly ignorant of business, he was grossly imposed upon by persons who played upon his simplicity. He was as ready to lend as to borrow, and to intrust entire strangers with loans for some charitable object without asking for any acknowledgment. He complains that what really oppresses him is, not the original sum which he received, and on which he undertook to pay interest, but the amount accruing through the operation of compound interest. In proof of this, he cites the case of a creditor who called upon him to pay $1100, who admitted that $800 represented interest, and who said that he was ready to cancel the debt on receiving back $300, the sum originally lent. But as the archbishop is unable to repay anything, it really matters little how the liabilities have risen so high. His position is a most painful one. He is in the eightieth year of his age and the forty-fifth of his episcopate; he has been looked up to as a model father of the Church, and now he owes more than $4,000,000, and has to confess insolvency.

Archbishop Purcell's case is instructive, not only on account of the misery which his mistaken conduct has caused, but on account of the light which it throws upon the propaganda of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States. That prelate's whole life was devoted to furthering the cause of his church, and he only did in an erroneous manner what other prelates are daily doing less exceptionably. The energy shown by the Church of Rome to obtain ascendancy in the Union quite equals that which the Puritans displayed when they determined to make Massachusetts a Christian commonwealth on their own model. It is estimated that one-fourth of the population is Roman Catholic, and the tendency to increase seems continuous. The late Mr. Robert Dale Owen devoted much labor to convince his fellow-citizens that the growing power of the Church of Rome was a peril to the principles on which the Republic was founded. His statistics and statements were alarming, but his remedy was not acceptable. He contended that nothing but a general adoption of the doctrines of Spiritualism would save the country, and he found that the cure was deemed as repugnant as the malady.—London Times.

THE CONDITION of the poor-houses in some of our States has long been a reproach to our civilization. In too many instances, they breed pauperism instead of curing it, contaminate the innocent and unfortunate by close contact with the vile and the indolent, and by neglecting to provide proper barriers between the sexes give rise to grave evils.—N. Y. Tribune.

ENGLISH WOMEN may take pride in the result of the first special examination for their sex held by the University of London. Of eleven young women examined, nine were successful, six of them taking honors and four scholarships—a better showing than any body of male applicants ever made.—Springfield Republican.

IF DEATH WERE TRULY DEATH.

If death were wooer soft, and life the wooed,
In some unlifted gloom;
If life were by decay's rank solitude
Stung and lost in the tomb,—
Were love, mirth, health, and smile and sweetened tear,
Choked by repining?
And all faint as vague dreams that disappear
At night's declining?
If death were death in truth, and not new bloom
Of deathless being,
And life ne'er led to life, and to resume
Its youthful seeling,—
Were fruitless waste our way, and one of sorrow
And plaint and pining?
For labor of the day such a still morrow
Not worth the gaining?
Away! away! the dull unhappy thinking
Such illness dire!
Away the falsehood of the heart so sinking
In hopeless mire!
I turn me to the East, where is no missing
The sun's vast fire.
I turn; my blood tingles beneath the kissing
Of wild desire:
"O sun! thou would'st then smile as clear and gloried
As e'er I hoped for!
And thou, O life, would'st be as nobly storied
As e'er age groped for!
Thou, heart, would'st at love heart still for sake of loving Where grief is weeper!
Thou, soul, would'st soothe the fond soul to promise proving That love were deeper!"
O'er the wide way the hordes of life are creeping
Bewildered, slowly;
Here are some joyed, and there kneel others weeping
In prayer lowly;
And love, and light, and laugh and shade are living,
And winsome hoping,
And cloud doth frown, and doubt is ever giving E'en faith its moping!

The Index.

BOSTON, JULY 3, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLSON OFFICE, No. 25 MONROE STREET: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

PRELIMINARY CONSIDERATIONS.

In the last number of THE INDEX we affirmed that the progress of rationalism is sufficiently advanced for entrance upon a more energetic and practical work in its interest than has yet been undertaken. This is a conclusion to which many of its most earnest and intelligent minds have been tending with increasing confidence for some years past. It has not been peculiar to over-sanguine and imaginative temperaments, but shared by not a few of the most conservative and deliberate of radicals.

It was announced in open and direct terms by Mr. Frothingham, in his recent farewell discourse. On the occasion referred to he frankly avowed that he uttered his last word in behalf of mere individualism. It was his conviction that this period was drawing to a close and the era of construction was at hand. In accordance with this persuasion he declared to his people that when the time should arrive for him to resume his work with them, which he looked forward to after a sufficient separation to recover his health, it would be with more constructive modes of operation and purposes.

This very noteworthy sign of the times, with other correspondent ones, was dwelt upon with special emphasis in the annual report of the Free Religious Association at its late session, which will be found in another part of this paper. They indicate a strong drift of thought and feeling among radicals at present. To such indications as these may be added the testimony of not a few of those of large practical experience in the field. Spiritualism has already done much in this direction,—for which should be accorded to it all credit. There is no class of liberals in America that has shown more appreciation of the importance of organization, energy for or power in putting it into successful operation. It is useless to deny that it has proved a deliverance to thousands who hitherto all their life long had been subject to bondage. It has given them an interest in science and modern inquiries which else they might not have obtained, and quickened them in more rational modes of thinking. But with all these admissions, and more that might be made in its favor, Spiritualism comes far short of meeting the present demands of the rational movement. While it has laid great stress upon criticism and science and the scientific method, there is no body of persons, not even the most superstitious of the Church, that has been so utterly unscientific in some particulars, that has fostered a larger amount of obstinate and irrational credulity. Instead of showing any special capacity to grapple with the great questions of society and problems of the age, it has been too largely, in its connection with the grand army of progress, little more than loiterers by the way, a band of untrained camp-followers living upon the resources of the march and claiming a share in its glories, but rendering uncertain and feeble contributions to its victories. It has exhibited little more than apathy and indifference in respect to some of the most vital movements of the time, and suffered its intellectual energies to be almost wholly absorbed in the tricks and impostures of dark-lantern seances, ghost hunting, and the tipping of tables. Thus Spiritualism shows itself deficient in the essential elements of a great expansive rationalistic movement. It gives little assurance, after the thirty years of its existence, of any inherent genius for intellectual transformation, adaptation to different orders of mind, or comprehensive development,—of proving in the main more than a spasmodic and perishable outgrowth of the peculiar mental conditions of the period that has witnessed its rise. Although embracing a rapidly-acquired, wide-spread, and numerous fellowship, it must inevitably remain, in a very emphatic sense, circumscribed in its range and influence. It cannot of itself, though never so valuable the stones which it may supply, found the new and enduring temple of the future. It cannot furnish the instant prerequisites for an ultimate, all-comprehending religion of humanity.

This might be pointed out in various ways, did space permit. With all due respect, then, for Spiritualism, for the service which it has rendered to rationalism,—with no disposition to detract from its merits, which we confess are many, or for a fling at it,—we simply aver, as has already been intimated, that it is not now nor has it ever been justly entitled to be considered a thoroughly rationalistic movement. It has never been more than partially such at best. With all its cry of science, it has been indisposed to adopt the methods of science and candidly subject itself to the tests of the scientific intelligence. Its "investigators" so-called, in the majority of instances, have been persons of a strong natural bias toward belief in its "phenomena," or otherwise in some degree incompetent for trustworthy testimony in respect to the subject. Putting aside, then, the question whether Spiritualism is true or false in itself, whether its theories and alleged facts are consistent with the laws of Nature and susceptible of demonstration, which are points we need not here consider, we still maintain it unfitted, both by its antecedents and methods of verification, for planning and organizing the great work of construction and up-building for which rationalism to-day is waiting. Its ideas may enter into such a movement, as they inevitably will and should, to be subjected to its more searching ordeal; but its whole moral and intellectual character would need to be elevated and greatly changed before it could enlist the sympathy of countless numbers of the pure and thoughtful of the time who have renounced, or are renouncing, the old beliefs, and are looking for better solutions of the problems of life, and modes of practical efficiency to their fellow-men. But this is something which there is not the slightest probability will happen.

Nor can rationalism afford to wait for so doubtful an issue. Its call is too imperative, its exigencies too pressing. Its soldiers cannot rest upon their arms. The battle is already waging in which it must join. The dangers are too serious and threatening to yield to such a delay. It was the dream of Mr. Abbot that the Liberal League movement might eventually become the rationalistic church of the future. It was planned for the accomplishment of this object, but from various reasons failed to realize the full significance of the conception. Its chief consideration was abstract and political subjects. These, although of inestimable importance, did not touch the even more urgent questions of social reformation and charity which rationalism is called upon to deal with. They did not embrace the great subject of moral culture in all its varied relations, and especially in the formation of individual character and the training of children. It was very largely a purely negative and destructive work. The work of rationalism in its completeness must be also constructive and affirmative. The aims of the Liberal League movement must still be carried forward, because they are founded in principles of reason and justice, and only through the triumph of them can rationalism have room for full development. It demands, and will continue to demand, the secularization of the State. But the Liberal League, it may as well be confessed with sadness, has suffered such demoralization and disrepute in consequence of events of its last Congress that for the larger number of its founders, and a very considerable one of radicals in general, it has well-nigh ceased to be. The conclusion, then, to which we are led from the foregoing survey of the field is this: There is none of the existing organizations in the interest of rationalism, even with all they include worthy of preservation and destined to be preserved, sufficiently comprehensive in its scope to afford a satisfactory basis for the constructive work before radicals at present; that can be so remodelled as to harmoniously answer to the best conceptions, larger views, and higher aspirations that are teeming in the brains and quickening the heart-beats of an ever-increasing multitude to-day. It will be seen that the theme we have been discussing is not exhausted. Its importance we feel sure will be conceded. We shall recur to it again.

SABBATH-BREAKING.

There is good reason to believe that to go to church is not always the best use of Sunday. It is a question whether it is as wrong to break the Lord's day as we have been taught—whether it may not, without heinous sin, sometimes be turned into man's day. The divine influences which are supposed to belong to it are more likely to come to us, often, amid the associations of Nature than in a temple.

Beneath the spacious depths of the blue heavens we are at times quickened to an aspiration and elevation of spirit that is not experienced under the gilded and fretted dome on which the most cunning skill has been expended. The music of the pines, the chant of the sea, the song of birds, may inspire a thrill of ecstasy and purer emotion than organ swell or choir of artistic singers; and the fragrance of flowers seem a holier incense than the perfume of censers. This was particularly impressed upon us two or three weeks since, when we joined a friend for a Sunday excursion from New York to a somewhat famous resort at this season.

There are, doubtless, many good people who would have pronounced such a neglect of the "privileges of the sanctuary" most sinful. They would have called it profaning the Lord's day, and considered us gross Sabbath-breakers. But somehow we were led to reflections, then and there, perhaps through the enemy of souls, which caused us to feel how absurd are such notions. Here was an outpouring from the over-crowded city of many thousands of human beings whose whole life is spent within brick walls and amid the dust and noise of glassless streets. They were from stores and workshops and warerooms, and all the manifold occupations of a dense and numerous population; some, whose realizations of the word home were all comprised in the contracted apartments of a boarding-house; children from the din of swarming school-rooms; families who scarcely had an hour together all the week. A tropical heat had raged for several days before, making the city air oppressive with stale scents and stifling exhalations. What a delightful and exhilarating contrast there was now in the sea-moistened breeze that fanned us as we cut our frothy way through the glistening waters! The familiar strains of "Pinafore" seemed enhanced with new melody as they came floating down from the band on the upper deck, and enlivened our spirits as island and fort and green country landscape with its grey rim of shore glided by in quick succession, like the unfolding of a panorama.

At our destination, the crowd soon dispersed in all directions, dotting the level beach for a long distance on either hand; some into groups of less or greater magnitude. Children sported in venturesome delight with the spray and the treacherous waves as they came stealthily creeping up the sand, now and then engulfing their feet and causing them to clap their hands with glee. Others tried their skill with velocipedes upon spacious wood floors, and little babes whose eye-lids already had grown heavy slept in swinging cradles considerably provided for their use. Upon the balconies and verandas of the open pavilions there were clusters of persons in conversation, from which merry voices sounded. Here sat one apart and smoked or read, with the restless blue waste spreading far and wide, and the white of distant sails in view; while there a young man and maiden wandered away in solitary companionship, telling a tale, perhaps, of profounder interest and sweeter cadence than what the waves were saying. The briny air sharpened the appetite and gave an exquisite relish to the savory dishes dispensed by a small army of waiters. All seemed cheerful; ill-temper, care, and anxiety for the nonce were banished.

Amid all the vast concourse of the entire day, there was not a single instance of indecorous conduct; scarcely one of any approach to intoxication. As we mingled among these Sabbath-breakers, we endeavored for the time to put ourselves in their place, and found it hard to believe that the day would have been more profitably passed by many of them if spent in the close atmosphere of a church or in listening to a sermon.

Communications.

SHOULD WE BE COMPELLED TO POISON OUR CHILDREN?

The subject of vaccination for small-pox is just now creating wide discussion in England, where since the Vaccination Act of 1853 vaccination has been compulsory. The Public Health Act of 1868, gives to the Privy Council the powers of appointing public vaccinators. The Vaccination Act of 1867 has since consolidated and amended the previous statutes on the subject. By it, the parent must have the child vaccinated within three months from birth, and the operation must be repeated until successful, unless the child be found unsusceptible.

Some of the best minds in England have been aroused to a sense of the injustice of this law. Startling statistics of cases of blood-poisoning through vaccination have been published, and much opposition to the enforcement of the act has been manifested. Hundreds of individuals have been prosecuted for non-compliance with the act, and many have submitted to repeated prosecutions, fines, and costs, rather than allow their children to be contaminated (as they view it) by vaccination. One man, a Mr. Luck, who had seen six of his family previously injured by the operation, persistently refuses to have two of his children vaccinated, and is consequently among those who are thus persecuted. A Mr. William Tebb, London, who has been repeatedly prosecuted by the Board of St. Pancras Guardians, London, because he will not allow his daughter, a healthy child, to be subjected to the operation, is among those who have suffered most in the way of repeated fines and costs, and is also one of the most vigorous workers for the repeal of the act.

Right Hon. John Bright says of the Compulsory Vaccination Act: "The law is monstrous, and ought to be repealed." Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone takes a similar position. Prof. F. W. Newman writes (Jan. 23, 1879) to Mr. Tebb a letter in which he speaks of the legislators as "committing usurpation by legislating against perfect health," and says the magistrates are guilty of oppression in enforcing the law, and ought to resign their posts rather than execute such a law. He says: "To poison the blood of healthy children is a wickedness which no honorable man ought to justify by saying that the State commands it; nor, therefore, ought he to compel a parent to do such a deed. No man is obliged to continue in the post of magistrate or guardian. If he is commanded to act oppressively, he can resign his post, and ought to resign it. Nothing is clearer to any one who will open his eyes, than that what is now called vaccination has no effect in lessening small-pox, and has frequent and terrible effect in doing mischief. . . . This pernicious and usurping law was passed without publicity and free debate, and Parliament did not know the dangers of various contagions from this false vaccination, of which the enforcement degrades law and makes Parliament itself odious. A patriot, methinks, would brave the authority of Parliament to save the honor of Parliament."

Baron Von Koenig says, probably referring to the early practice of vaccination among the Turks: "Vaccination is a remnant of a great medieval superstition, from which every claim to State protection should be withdrawn." Count Tredwitz says: "The State has no right to prescribe a medical creed to any man, and no man with any self-respect who has once seen through the shameless deceit of vaccination will, without resisting to the uttermost, ever consent to the degradation of allowing those near and dear to him to be subject to it."

"Mr. Baxendall has shown" (I quote from an article from the St. Leonards and Hastings Gazette) "from the Registrar General's returns that, under compulsory vaccination, the small-pox deaths in London have increased one hundred and thirty-two per cent., and Dr. Pearce has shown from the same official returns the enormous increase of a loathsome disease in infants which is specially liable to be transmitted by vaccination." Dr. Pearce and others have also shown that phthisis, bronchitis, pneumonia, measles, whooping-cough, and other inoculable maladies, have enormously increased since vaccination was adopted.

Testimony of other Physicians.

"Dr. Shorthouse regards compulsory vaccination as the most costly humbug. Dr. Cornell of New York is firmly convinced that vaccination is a curse to the human race. T. L. Nichols, M.D., says he has no doubt that thousands have been mortally poisoned by vaccination. Dr. Skinner is perfectly certain that vaccination is no protection. Dr. Keller has proved that more vaccinated than unvaccinated are attacked by small-pox. Dr. Hermann is convinced that vaccination is the greatest delusion in the science of medicine. Dr. Collins was so alarmed at the effects of vaccination that he gave up the practice, and with it an income of $500 a year. Dr. Hitchman says, 'I have seen hundreds of children killed by vaccination.' Dr. Stramm strongly condemns vaccination."

So much for transatlantic testimony. The various testimonies given in the Vaccination Inquirer, published in London, seem to indicate that vaccination opens the door to vice and disease. If, by vaccination, a person becomes liable to any or all the inoculable diseases which may have existed; either latent or developed in the person from whom the lymph was taken, it is certainly important that the fact be known.

An important case in corroboration of the foregoing testimony was recently given to the writer, of the introduction of a terrible disease through vaccination, throughout a whole county in Indiana, by a travelling doctor who was inoculating for small-pox. The details, which were horrible, would extend to too great length an article which has already, I fear, exceeded due limits. E. J. L.

INFINITE INTELLIGENCE.

EDITOR INDEX:—

As, by a process of deduction (see communication in THE INDEX, issue of May 15), starting from the premise that something has always existed, we arrive at non-originality in the absolute, and therefore at infinite intelligence, so, by a process of induction, starting from the fact that man is progressive, we arrive at infinite intelligence, and therefore at non-originality in the absolute. Man, we all know, is progressive; and progress is towards something: it cannot be towards nothing. Now what does man progress towards? Towards a knowledge of all that is, substantially as well as phenomenally. And this knowledge, of course, is existent; for, as already stated, there can be no progress towards that which is non-existent towards nothing. Hence, there is infinite knowledge, infinite intelligence. Now, as the knowledge is existent, that of which the knowledge is possessed must be existent, phenomenally as well as substantially, for substance can be known only through its phenomena, or to the extent only of its phenomenal manifestation; hence, phenomena in their entirety must measure substance in its infinity, or the actual phenomena must express all that substance is capable of, otherwise knowledge cannot be infinite. Consequently there is not now, never has been, and never can be, anything absolutely original, in the domain of matter or any other domain. The assumption of absolute originality is on a par with the assumption that something can be produced from nothing; that the infinite can be increased; that something can exist outside of that which has no outside. Some men of prominence in the domain of thought assume that infinite intelligence is not. But on the assumption that infinite intelligence is not, it follows that the infinite, so-called, produces something original to itself; hence it commenced to produce; therefore itself had a commencement. Consequently, infinite? By no means; simply a greater finite, and, substantially, nothing. Others, again, assume that there is infinite intelligence, but that it becomes conscious only in man; in other words, that it is finitely conscious, infinitely unconscious. Now if the infinite possesses any consciousness whatever, and it is patent that it does,—it is infinitely conscious. It is simply absurd to say that the infinite is finite, as in effect is said when it is affirmed that infinite intelligence becomes conscious only in man, or, in other words, that it is finitely conscious. The infinite can be finite in nothing. If we assume, as in this communication it is assumed, that there is one, infinite, all-inclusive substance, we are logically carried to the conclusion, not only that consciousness is latent in unconscious matter, but that there is infinite consciousness as well. For, if there is one, infinite, all-inclusive substance, it inevitably follows that the finite is, in substance, the same as the infinite; therefore the infinite is latent in the finite, or the infinite is, actually, all that the finite is potentially; consequently consciousness is not only latent in unconscious matter, but there is also infinite consciousness. It will be seen that the same argument prevails against the second assumption concerning infinite intelligence that prevails against the first, for both involve absolute originality with its train of absurdities. Still others assume that there is infinite intelligence, and that it is possessed by a personality. But that which is finite in space cannot be infinite in intelligence; and as all things else are external to a personality, no personality can be otherwise than finite in space. Consequently no personality, in the usually received sense of the term, can be possessed of infinite intelligence. As the finite had a commencement, it of course commenced to produce; therefore it produces something original to itself. As the infinite, on the other hand, did not have a commencement, it of course did not commence to produce; therefore it produces nothing original to itself. Consequently there is infinite intelligence, of which we do not and cannot have experience, as well as finite intelligence, of which we do have experience. As stated in the communication to THE INDEX referred to at the commencement: "We can proceed from finite intelligence of which we have experience to infinite intelligence of which we have no experience, and obtain an adequate conception of the one from the other. The aggregate intelligence of man although finite is immense, and no one of the personalities to whom it attaches can possess it at all; or the intelligence of no one of the personalities can equal that of the aggregate of personalities. Now let us consider the intelligence and the personalities extended to infinity, and we have infinite intelligence distributed through an infinity of personalities,—an intelligence which no personality nor any finite number of personalities can ever possess in its entirety, but of which each and every one is forever appropriating more and more. While the intelligence of each and every personality is forever expanding, the aggregate intelligence, being infinite, is eternally the same,—constituting the infinite intelligence of an infinite personality to which nothing is external." It is perfectly transparent that the aggregate intelligence possessed by any number of progressive personalities, provided it be finite, would, if they survived, be eventually possessed by each and every one. It is equally clear, on the other hand, that the aggregate intelligence possessed by an infinite number of progressive personalities, provided it be infinite, could never be possessed by each and every one, nor by any finite number thereof.

Having, as I think, demonstrated in a satisfactory manner that infinite intelligence consciously exists, and having shown that it can exist as it is here assumed that it does, it will be well in conclusion to show that it does so exist. As the infinite, never having had a commencement and therefore never having commenced to produce, produces nothing original to itself, it follows that progressive personalities have from all eternity been produced; therefore the aggregate of progressive personalities has from all eternity been infinite; consequently the aggregate intelligence has likewise from all eternity been infinite.

MY CREED.

In THE INDEX of June 12, 1879, I saw an article from Daniel Cony which proposed to individual freethinkers to give a short statement of their belief. The suggestion I think a good one. My belief does not differ materially from the opinions expressed by Mr. Cony. I would alter his first article so that it would read:—

1. I believe in one eternal supreme existence, which embraces all mind, matter, motion, power, etc.; that all separate existences are but parts of this harmonious, stupendous whole; that this whole always existed and always will; that it is governed by universal unchanging law in all of its parts.

On the above subject what I have said is to me the most reasonable conclusion to which I can come.

2. Man is a finite being; as an individual he had a beginning, but whether, as an individual, he will always exist in the future, I neither affirm nor deny; but I hope he may.

3. I know man is an accountable, responsible being; i.e., there are certain acts which if he does suffering to him will ensue, the knowledge of which suffering is to him a motive not to do such acts; and as happiness is man's object in life, he is thus compelled to refrain, for he can only choose as he is moved by the stronger motive. No man can lay his hand on a red-hot plate of iron and retain it there five seconds without a motive; if any one thinks he can, let him try it. I once told a man he could not do such a thing, when a red-hot stove was before him. He replied, "If I don't do it, it is not because I can't, but it is because I will not to do it." I replied, "Don't you see you have hit the nail on the head. You will not to do it, because the motive in such direction is the stronger, and cannot of course, at the same time, will to do it. For the will cannot be operative in two opposite directions at the same time. Here are two things operating on your will at the same time: one to convince me that you can do it, the other to prevent you from the pain of a burned hand and its consequences; and the latter is the stronger. The truth is, you have the physical power to do it, but you have not the will power; and that is just what you can't get without first having the motive."

4. Perhaps it will be said I have been proving man not a responsible being. I have not said a word that shows man is not ruled, rewarded, and punished according to established law, and made to know it; but whether he knows or believes it, this is the case, and I can see that such a ruling and governing of man is not in discord with love, mercy, or justice, for a combination of love, mercy, and justice often inflicts pain. We often see this combination in a single person inflicting pain on himself, in parents inflicting pain on their children; and this same combination requires and justifies governments inflicting pain on their subjects. And now, does not the great Governing Power of all stand justified by the same combination in inflicting pain wherever we see it inflicted?

5. We see these laws are given in mercy and made unchangeable; that man may always know what to depend upon; the laws are made general, universal, apply to all conditions, to each individual life, whether child, brother, sister, parent, ruler, or ruled.

6. Here is the grand lesson of life, as well as for death and eternity, to be learned. Seeing we are existing under such laws, punished or rewarded by them, the great lesson to be learned is, What are they, and how can I keep myself in such relation to them as to give to myself and all others the greatest amount of happiness possible? The answer to this question will tell what truth is in all of its ramifications, in agriculture, trade, mechanics, art, science, government, morals, and religion. Perhaps it would not be improper to say, religion in its fullest significance includes a knowledge of all the laws of the Supreme Power. Mr. Abbot defines religion to be "an effort of man to perfect himself." Man, in order to be perfect, of course would have to understand all laws and live accordingly. But the great teachers of religion, especially teachers of what is called the Christian religion, separate religion from morals; i.e., declare that religion alone will save a man from future punishment, while morals alone will not; and all refer us to certain books where we can learn what religion is. The Chinese, Hindus, Persians, Mohammedans, Jews, and Christians refer us to different books for this purpose,—all divine, they say, and inspired by God. I don't say that there is not much truth, many truths, in the books referred to; but what I believe is, the affirmation of anything in any book does not make the thing affirmed true. What is truth is true, independent of what any book or man might say, and is found in the nature of things and their relations to each other and the whole. I believe what has been and is called religion, independent of the relations referred to, is a creature of the imagination—superstition. He, then, who learns the greatest amount of all the laws which are for his direction in all his relations in life, and lives in such relation to them as to give to himself and others most happiness, is most religious. It is what all should aspire towards. If mankind had to read and compare all that has ever been written on religion, so-called, before they could safely judge as to what is right, they would be in a most deplorable condition.

7. I believe that the Nazarene was the prince of free-thinkers. It will be remembered that on one occasion he tells his disciples he had many things to say to them, but they were not able to hear them; i.e., as I understand him, they could not appreciate them. But, says Jesus, when He, the Spirit of Truth, is come, He will guide you into ALL TRUTH. Jesus knew that at that time the spirit of truth had not come, and his disciples could not at that time appreciate what he would say. Now I think the spirit of truth is abroad in the land; the spirit of truth which demands investigation and verification; and such ideas as can't stand these tests, it holds as yet unknown. It may not deny, but it will not affirm. All hail to this spirit of truth!

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

A REMARKABLE MAN.—HE WRITES HIS OWN FUNERAL ORATION, AND GIVES DIRECTIONS AS TO HIS FUNERAL.

The subject of this sketch was born in Kappel, Kingdom of Wurtemberg, Germany, of Jewish parents, on the 28th of October, 1813, and was consequently sixty-five years of age. He was the oldest of three brothers and five sisters, who all survive him. He was educated for the profession of a teacher of German and Hebrew. After graduating from the seminary, he entered upon the duties of his profession. Although liberal, religious, and political opinions were in those early days quite rare, his nature soon revolted under the double restraint of a monarchical government and strictly theological ritual, as well as on account of the meagre salaries paid to all teachers in Germany. He was anxious to improve his own prospects, as well as to assist his mother, who had been left a widow with eight children. He resolved to emigrate to America, and landed in New York in 1850, where his younger brother Abraham had preceded him a year before. On his arrival he abandoned his regular profession of teacher, because he knew his religious opinions were incompatible with such a profession, and went into trade.

Mr. Einstein was never married; but sometimes he regretted his neglect to get married, and thought it foolish for men to delay this change in life until age overtakes them. In the absence of a family of his own, he took a fatherly interest in the children of his widowed sister, Mrs. Klenmaier, but more particularly in those of his brother Abraham, with whom he boarded for over twenty-five years.

Mr. Einstein's character and nature were of the most positive kind. No one ever thought of doubting his veracity or honesty, and nothing could induce him to do anything which he thought was wrong, nor could any argument change his prejudices and settled opinions.

His most marked peculiarities, however, were his religious opinions, or, we should rather say, his irreligious views. He was an infidel of the most positive and uncompromising kind. This he was already when Col. Ingersoll was still a young man. There was nothing sacred to him in religious matters. He looked upon religion as something founded upon delusion and the result of early education, and he defended his views on this subject, both in conversation, in newspapers, and in a book which he published several years ago, entitled The History of Religious Beliefs. His most intimate friends, outside of his own family, were those who were opposed to all Orthodox creeds. He looked upon death without the least fear, and was as ready for it as the most devout martyr. He bought long ago a burial lot for himself in Woodlawn Cemetery. Some time ago he wrote out what he called "My own funeral sermon," and also left minute written directions regarding it.

In spite of his peculiar theological opinions, the deceased was well liked and universally respected by our citizens, and was repeatedly chosen to serve as judge of election in the Fourth Ward, where he resided. His own life was so strictly moral that he sincerely believed the whole world would be equally so if he could only convert it to his belief. He therefore was always laboring with that end in view.

The funeral of deceased took place yesterday afternoon, and was conducted strictly according to the directions. A large number of friends and neighbors were present at the ceremonies both in the house and at the cemetery.

In accordance with request of deceased, the Hon. William Barnsdall, Mayor of Titusville, read the funeral sermon written by the deceased himself, adding some cheering words for the benefit of the friends of the departed.

Mr. Barnsdall, who was an intimate friend of the deceased, eulogized him as a man of honor and integrity, notwithstanding his peculiar theological views. Judging from Mr. Einstein's expressions while in life, it would have been a pleasure to him could he have heard his own sermon delivered by his Honor the Mayor. A profound silence reigned among the spectators during the continuance of the ceremonies. —Titusville Morning Herald, June 19.

A LETTER TO THE WOMEN OF MASSACHUSETTS.

The Legislature of Massachusetts, at its last session, conferred upon the women of the State the right to vote for members of school committees. That right grants, alike to those who have not sought it and to those who have desired it, a share in the responsibility of guarding the best interests of our schools.

We believe that those women who care for the wise education of children will wish to avail themselves of this opportunity. That none may be prevented from so doing, by lack of knowledge respecting the practical details connected with the exercise of a function so new to us all, we offer the following information:—

Women who have paid a State or county tax within two years of election need not take any action except to be registered. This may be done, in Boston, until fourteen days before election; in other cities, until seven days before election; in towns, until the Saturday before election. If the tax has been paid by parent or guardian, it is sufficient; if the tax was assessed on the woman's property, standing in her name, it is sufficient, although paid by the hand of another. The office of registration can easily be found in any city or town. In Boston, it is at 30 Pemberton Square, where, on presentation of her last tax-bill, any woman who has paid taxes within two years can be registered, after giving evidence of her educational fitness, by signing her name and reading a few lines from the Constitution of the United States.

Women who have not hitherto paid taxes should go to the Assessors' office, which in Boston is in City Hall, before September 15, and there express their wish to pay a poll tax, stating at the same time whether or not they hold any property subject to taxation. These requirements are identical with those prescribed for male voters, by the Act of 1874. It may be well to add that recent legislation provides for a division of State and county poll-tax, and that the payment of either one of them renders a person who is liable to no other tax eligible for registration.

These steps being taken,—and for this a few minutes will suffice,—nothing remains except to inform ourselves respecting the candidates, and give our votes on the day of election to those whom we think are fitted, by character, education, and public spirit, for service on school committees. By thus coöperating with conscientious and intelligent men in protecting the welfare of our common schools, we shall be doing good service in the cause of education, which is of such vital importance to the whole community.

Signed: Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Mrs. R. E. Apthorp, Mrs. William Claflin, Mrs. J. F. Clarke, Miss Sarah F. Clarke, Miss Florence M. Cushing, Mrs. J. W. Dickinson, Miss I. E. Gray, Mrs. Dwight Foster, Mrs. George S. Hale, Mrs. Augustus Hemenway, Miss Ellen Hyde, Mrs. Jona. A. Lane, Miss Anna C. Lowell, Mrs. George R. Russell, Mrs. O. C. Smith, Miss Hannah Stevenson, Mrs. I. T. Talbot, Mrs. George A. Walton, Mrs. John Ware, Mrs. R. C. Waterston, Mrs. Henry Whitman.

MRS. LUCY STONE BLACKWELL.

THE LEGAL DISCUSSION ON HER RIGHT TO VOTE UNDER HER MAIDEN NAME.

Thus far not more than fifty women have presented themselves for registration in order to be able to vote for the Boston school board at the next municipal election. The first to present herself was Mrs. Lucy Stone (Blackwell), but she was told that she could not be registered without presenting to the registrars a paid tax-bill—a matter which she failed to do. She was passed by, and another lady, Mrs. Dr. Spaulding, who had come fortified with the necessary city document, received the honor of a first registry, which she (Mrs. Blackwell) had aspired to, and to which she was entitled by virtue of long and leading services in the cause of woman suffrage. Mrs. Stone (Blackwell) has made no reply to the secretary of the assessors in regard to the opinion given by the city solicitor, which is that she must be assessed in her husband's name, and so registered, in order to vote with her sex, who will have complied with the legal requirements. It is understood that she has advised with counsel as to her rights in these premises, and one venerable gentleman of the legal profession told the writer that he is now looking up the laws of the land and the English authorities upon the subject. Mrs. Stone (Blackwell) has lady friends who insist that she should not be hindered from being legally assessed and registered as Lucy Stone, because that is the name which she has always been known by in public and in society. One lady, born a foreigner, asked for registration the other day and claimed her right to be registered because her husband was naturalized. The law in relation to the matter was looked up, and her claim to be registered under such circumstances was found to be correct. If this individuality which Mrs. Stone (Blackwell) demands for herself could be allowed, would this foreign-born female be registered without first being naturalized? Rather than give up her idiosyncratic theory, however, the persistent leader of the woman's suffrage movement will sacrifice the vote for which she has labored for forty years. At least her friends say that she will not vote unless as Lucy Stone, the name she bore as a maiden, fancy free. —Boston Globe, June 16.

CALIFORNIA'S CONSTITUTION.

The triumph at the polls of the new California Constitution becomes a matter of the gravest importance, as it may have serious effects all over the country in the direct effects upon interstate commerce of the new fundamental law, and in the indirect effects upon the popular mind of the triumph of so curious and radical a departure from the traditions of legislation. Some of the new features are no doubt improvements, but the Constitution contains concessions to the spirit of communism which would be more appropriate in Paris during the wild days of 1871 than in the United States of America in 1879. Not satisfied with laying down general principles of legislation, which is the proper work of a constitution, the instrument goes into the details of law-making, and fills eleven columns of fine type in the big San Francisco papers with special laws upon all sorts of subjects. Regarding the Chinese, it denies them the right to inherit, hold, or transmit real property, or to vote, or work for any corporation holding a charter from the State, on public works. The Legislature is provided with further power to prevent their introduction, and to delegate similar power to municipalities.

There are a number of useful provisions correcting the abuses of corporations and attempting to correct stock gambling. For the government of railroads, a commission is provided which has almost despotic power to correct pretty nearly every evil that can arise in the business of transportation.

It is in the tax system that the most stupendous changes are made. Church property is to be taxed, which is just enough; and mortgages and nearly every other evidence of debt are taxed, which is not just at all; while stocks are taxed two or three times over; and the whole system, including an income tax, is so graded as to bear heavier and heavier pro rata upon the rich. The old provision for equal taxation is abolished, and it is practically provided, not merely that the more a man has the more he should pay, but the higher percentage he should pay.

Lobbying is declared a felony; the old jury in civil cases is practically abolished, as three-fourths of the jury are made competent to give a verdict; the governor is made ineligible to be United States Senator; eight hours constitute a day's work; all contracts for the delivery of stock on a future day are declared void, a provision aimed at stock gambling; the prices of telegrams, gas, storage, wharfage, are to be regulated by the Legislature.

These provisions are only a small part of those which the new Constitution furnishes for the government of California. California, no doubt, can live under it, as it could live under almost any sort of law; but it will be because a great deal of it, after a few trials, will be quietly ignored.—Detroit Echo.

INCOMPETENT DOCTORS.

With the exception of one college in New York and two in other States, says Barnes' Educational Monthly, any one may become a medical student without preliminary examinations in anything, moral character not excepted. Students are often graduated at the close of two years' study, and in some institutions the course of instruction is even more superficial and imperfect. Examinations for diplomas are not at all rigid, a knowledge even of chemical analysis not being required. There is not a single doctor in one of the counties in Western New York who can conduct a decent chemical analysis, or even tell whether his nitrate of bismuth does or does not contain arsenic. A doctor recently stated on examination that the proper dose of prussic acid for a child two years old was from four to six drops! As a general thing, doctors in rural places, and in some of our cities as well, stick to antiquated remedies and outrageous doses. We think our educational journals ought to stir up the young doctors to more diligent habits as students. Each one of them should have his chemical laboratory, where he daily should conduct such chemical analyses as sickness demands. If doctors were a little more enterprising and pushing we should know something more concerning such diseases as typhoid fever, diphtheria, scarlet fever, and measles. Call two doctors in succession to a child attacked with one of these diseases, and the probabilities are they will give you contradictory explanations and totally different remedies. This is no recommendation to the medical profession. Because doctors are not scientific, the practice of medicine is not conducted on scientific principles, and medicine is not to-day a science. It is a practice, we admit, much to the horror of sensitive tastes. The day will be hailed with joy by a disease-cured world when this practice is conducted on scientific principles. We laymen would like to know many things our medical advisers will not tell us, simply because they cannot. Let us have some light on those diseases lurking unsubdued in all parts of our land. It is your duty to enlighten the world, and if you are the students you should be, some of you will bless this humanity of ours by telling exactly what will cure certain diseases, and why it will do so. You should be paid to prevent as well as cure. We would rather give you twenty-five dollars to keep us well than ten to cure us when sick.—Springfield Republican.

CHURCH TAXATION.

It was hardly to be expected that the proposition to tax church property, which was sprung in the Legislature on Friday, would result in anything but the desultory and unsatisfactory debate which followed. It was too late in the session to begin the discussion of so important a question and to attempt, with any hope of success, the inauguration of so radical a departure from the traditions of taxation in Michigan. Yet it is a good thing that it was broached. The discussion, brief and scrappy as it was, will awake thought; and the more the people think on this subject the less respect they will have for a system which is different only in degree from an established church, and which is just the same outrage upon the tax-payers which was perpetrated on the people of France before the revolution, when the Church absorbed, by her exemption from taxation, pretty much all the property there was in the realm. The injustice weighs lightly upon us now, because we are rich beyond all the nations of the earth; but it will grow more and more irksome as population grows denser and the expenses of government increase, and may yet press upon us so heavily as to require a revolution to throw it off, as it did in France. They are the worst enemies of religion who advocate the continuation of this unjust subsidy, this palpable disregard of the constitutional principle of equal taxation. Such privileges and exceptions have brought ruin upon religion in many of the old countries, and cannot fall of the same result here. The arguments advanced in its favor are the merest drivel, and can be disposed of with a word. There is little hope of anything being accomplished in the present session, but the debate is at least formally opened, and we trust it will be continued.—Detroit Echo.

CATHOLIC CHURCH FINANCES.

THE BISHOP OF MONTREAL SERIOUSLY INVOLVED.—UNABLE TO MEET ACCORDING INTEREST ON DEBTS.—AN APPEAL FOR AID.

MONTREAL, June 17.

A good deal of excitement was manifested here to-day on its becoming known that the Roman Catholic bishop of Montreal, Mgr. Fabre, was involved, like Archbishop Purcell, in financial difficulties. It appears that large loans were obtained for building sixteen churches, as well as other work connected with the diocese, and that, owing to the enormous depreciation in house property here from which rents were received, the revenue of the diocese has fallen off to such an extent that the bishop was unable to meet the accruing interest. The diocese has been always considered one of the richest in Canada, being the owner of vast estates in this city as well as outside. The bishop has appealed to the one hundred and fifty-two parishes in the diocese for aid. He asks each parish to lend him $1000 for five years without interest. All the religious communities have been called on to do the same, and the laity are required to do their share. In return for such assistance, the bishop promises in his appeal to celebrate annually for twenty-five years two grand masses, one for the living and the other for the dead. The amount of indebtedness is not made public, but to one estate alone, that of the late Mr. Masson, the sum is said to be $200,000. The bishop has broken up his episcopal residence in the palace in this city, and is going into a modest cottage in the suburbs, which will be a saving of at least $10,000 or $15,000 per annum. He will shortly leave for Rome to lay the state of the diocese before the papal authorities. Bishop Fabre only succeeded Archbishop Bourget of Guibord fame on the latter's resignation two years ago, but was for several years before that the archbishop's coadjutor. He is a comparatively young man, little over fifty, and is greatly esteemed by all denominations. He is a brother of Senator Fabre, of Quebec, a distinguished journalist and liberal statesman.—Boston Herald.

JEWISH INFLUENCE IN FRANCE.

In some circles of Europe, the government of the French Republic is regarded with special interest on account of the Jewish descent of some of the men holding leading positions. Messrs. Gambetta, Jules Simon, and Jules Favre are said to have a good share of Jewish blood in their veins, if not of pure Jewish extraction. The self-possession, calmness, and deliberation of these gentlemen have surprised everybody, and won the admiration of all, except those they have defeated. Yet should we be surprised at composure and caution in a Jew, when we remember the long and severe trials through which he has passed, and which he has almost invariably turned to his advantage? Still it is a very suggestive fact that the administration of French affairs has fallen so naturally into the hands of the children of Judah. Under the generous toleration and the principles of humanity established by Protestantism, the Jew is steadily rising in influence and importance. No Christian can regard this fact, characteristic of our times, with any other feeling than one of genuine satisfaction. It is also exceedingly pleasant to notice the noble qualities more and more exhibited by the ancient people as the distance is increased between them and the prejudice, the social ostracism, and the fearful persecutions to which they were subjected not long ago,—a treatment for which the Papacy is largely responsible.—Christian Intelligencer.

WOMAN AND SOCIAL SCIENCE.

Miss Ella A. Martin, who is said to be one of the rising young lawyers of Chicago, lately read a paper before the Social Science Association of that city on "The Importance of the Study of Political Science to Woman." The aim of the writer was to show that most of the reforms and philanthropies in which women are prominently engaged have some vital connection with the underlying principles of our government, and that it will be impossible for women to accomplish any permanent results in this direction until they have first mastered the laws of political economy, and learned to work in accordance with natural order and progress. The questions of temperance, labor, contagious diseases, etc., were reviewed, and the necessity of applying to their solution more reasonable methods than have hitherto prevailed clearly demonstrated. The final words to and about woman deserve wide circulation: "A very considerable part of their (women's) efforts are utterly futile; and why? Because they take no pains to master the problems with which the world is contending. The world sees that they know very little of the practical difficulties of those things about which they talk, and passes them by. Intellectual strength and broad understanding will do more to make woman a power for good than anything else."—Chicago Unity, June 16.

A CORRESPONDENT wishes to know if we are the author of the American Encyclopedia. Well, no; not exactly the author of it. We killed the Iowa canvasser, however, if that is what you mean.—Burlington Hawkeye.

FOREIGN.

THE REV. J. PAGE HOPPS, at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, introduced a motion to the effect that the Afghan and Zulu wars were immoral. The chairman declared Mr. Hopps to be out of order, and the motion was not pressed.

THE Daily News, recapitulating the events which led up to the admission of Jews to Parliament, says it will probably seem to some coming generation an almost incredible thing that in a modern and civilized day a principle of legislation could have existed in this country by virtue of which a man like Baron Lionel de Rothschild was deliberately excluded from the full rights of citizenship. No man could be more entirely a citizen of this community; and he will long be remembered as one of the most useful citizens the city of London has ever known.

SUNDAY AND THE ROYAL FAMILY.—It was quite a charming little scene on Autenil Race-course last Sunday. A quantity of wicked Sabbath-breakers, in defiance of the Lord's Day Observance Society, went racing, and sat joking and betting and enjoying themselves, dressed up in showy fal-lals, when, of course, they ought to have been at church or saying their prayers quietly at home. Among them was the gentleman who is one day to be head of the English Church, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and by his side, dressed in the loveliest dark-green silk, with a black bugle cuirasse, and looking as happy as she ever looks now, sat—blush, ye bench of bishops; wriggle ye chapel-goers of Clapham—the Princess his wife. And the Princess was attended—another blow for pious England—by Miss Knollys. . . . I think if P. W. likes to go racing on Sundays, he should be allowed to. I always go when I'm in Paris, and I would in London if there were any.—"Dagonet," in Referee, June 15.

THE EUROPEAN PROSPECT.—The Pall Mall Gazette says: "There never was a time, perhaps, when the international affairs of Europe, or when the fortunes of its populations, more closely depended upon the existence of two or three individuals. With the removal of any one of these persons, the position of millions of civilized beings—their lives and fortunes entirely at the disposal of an emperor here, an emperor there, a minister in one place, a little gang of superior male and female diplomatists in another—will almost infallibly be altered for better or for worse. All of these most potent and all but irresponsible individuals are old men and infirm. In a few years, at most, the German Emperor that is, the Otar that is, the Bismarcks and Gortschakoffs, will have departed from the world which they now govern according to their mere will and fancy; or according to as much of a compact as they can agree upon in the seclusion of their respective sitting-rooms. Even on the departure of any one of these persons much may change; and the people, who are as much the helpless tools and creatures of their rulers as the Egyptians of old were, will find themselves under heaven knows what sort of new conditions. Whether it is to be more war or a little peace, more liberty or a yet longer period of subjection to the grinding militarism which now oppresses all that is free and wholesome in the growth of civilization, it is impossible to say. In some quarters the prospect looks hopeful, in others the outlook is of continued dreariness; but what seems probable on the whole is, that though the inevitable and very near change may be begun in increased confusion, the end will be good. For such a result, at any rate, we may fairly hope. Europe has been too long under the domination of family parties of autocrats with vast plans of personal ambition attempted or fulfilled at the cost of the mass of mankind."

JESTINGS.

NO MAN should live beyond the means of his creditors.

A SUNBEAM is very light, but you can't get men enough together to raise one end of it.

A POPULAR loan at the South is one that a fellow (or State) gets without obligation to pay back.

THE LITTLE girl looks forward to the time when she can "do up" her hair like a lady, as a period of true hair-pinness.

PROFOUND thought by a statesman: "If you want to hear anything good said of you in your lifetime, circulate a report that you're dead."

REV. DR. HENSON, at Philadelphia, in a prayer, thanked God for the gift of speech. When we remember that the gentleman makes his living by it, we may easily think he does well to offer thanks for it.—Commonwealth.

"I SUPPOSE the bells are sounding an alarm of fire," said a scoffer, as the church bells called the worshippers one Sunday morning. A minister passing overheard the remark, and replied: "Yes, my friend; but the fire is not in this world."

REV. DR. SOMNIFEROUS, having the week previous married a couple, is interrupted by the ex-bridegroom, while enjoying the paper and a quiet cup of tea. Ex-bridegroom: "Ah! my dear doctor, allow me to present you with a little memento ($10 bill). That marriage turned out better than I expected."—Harvard Lampoon.

MISS CALINO goes for the first time to see the sea at Dieppe. At her departure for home, her sister recommends her to carry back some sea-water in a bottle. She goes down to the shore and fills her vial with water. "Better not fill it up like that, missy," said a sailor, "bekase, it bein' low water now, when the tide rises it'll bust your bottle." Miss Calino, quite convinced, empties half the water from her vial and departs.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

4. The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary in this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

SIFTINGS.

AS WE aspire toward what is above, let us not forget what is below us.

"THEOLOGY is an excellent nurse, but a bad mistress for grown-up minds."

IT IS THOUGHT that Dennis Kearney would not object to a seat in Congress.

IT HAS lately been said that men go to church nowadays to please their wife's relations.

THE COLORED people are to have a convention at Louisville, Ky., soon, to take an inside view of the situation.

"I WILL SHOW you," said one of the ancients, "how to make a love potion without either drugs or spells. If you make be loved, love."

QUAKERISM decides that it does not intend to die at present. It would be difficult to name a sect that has a better right to live.

THINK OF IT! No ringing of bells nor firing of cannon on the Fourth in Boston. Could there be evidence more conclusive of the decline of patriotism?

EMERSON DOES NOT approve of the custom among congressmen of pairing votes. A vote for the right, he says, cannot be paired equally with a vote for the wrong.

THE NEW YORK Herald, in its report of the Hull funeral, remarked: "There was a whispered mockery in the words, 'The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away.'"

WE READ IN a German paper that in the province of Brandenburg there are at present thirty-eight vacant pulpits, owing to a lack of "soul-guardians." Truly a sign of the times.

PROFESSOR PATTON, of Chicago, deprecates the small numbers and poor quality of candidates for the Presbyterian ministry. The "best brains," he thinks, do not study for the profession.

"HUMANITY reveals itself in fragments; one man is the embodiment of one kind of excellence, another of another. Achilles wins the victory and Homer immortalizes it: we bestow the laurel crown on both."—George H. Lewes.

THE PROPRIETY of continuing the observance of fast-days was lately up for discussion in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and debated at considerable length. It was pretty generally conceded that these days were observed less strictly than formerly. One of the disputants went so far as to declare that the last fast-day in Glasgow was the fastest day he had ever seen in his life.

REV. SAMUEL DAVIS, a Baptist clergyman, lately preached a sermon on infidelity at Somerville, Mass. It is evident Mr. Davis is a person of strong convictions. The quotation we give below from a report of his discourse serves to indicate how he would fix things, in one instance at least, if he had the power. "The speaker" we are told, "condemned the Jews for keeping open shop on Sunday, and said that as this is America, and we have appointed a day for the Lord, the Jews should be compelled to observe Sunday."

ACCORDING to disclosures that have come to light, it appears that the Roman Catholic bishop of Montreal, like his brother bishop across the border, has a poor head for figures. His accounts are in a deplorable condition. His books won't balance worth a cent. No one, it is said, dares to conjecture the amount of his liabilities, but the impression seems general that they are very heavy. He appeals to the "faithful" to help him out of the scrape, and promises to pay them in masses for the living and the dead. What a pity it is that some of the rest of us cannot be relieved of our embarrassments in that way!

ENGLAND APPEARS to be paying dear for its whistle. Its whistle in this instance is the Zulu war, which it is reported costs $2,500,000 a week. This is Bishop Colenso's opinion of it: He declares it a "most unrighteous and unnecessary" one, which has been "forced on by the policy of the high commissioner; in which already ten thousand human beings have been killed, two thousand five hundred on our side and seven thousand five hundred on that of the Zulus; and which, unless, as may be hoped, the Secretary of State interferes in the interests of peace, will be carried, no doubt, to its bitter end, involving the killing of thousands more and the expenditure of millions of English money."

THE REV. DR. B. (Benjamin we suppose) FRANKLIN (by the way, it seems strange to think of Benjamin Franklin as a doctor of divinity) complains in the Churchman that such books as Max Müller's lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion, and Dr. Shields' (of Princeton) The Final Philosophy, "yield the claim of historic Christianity, that man has failed and can never become sufficient for himself to work out his own salvation, and that Christianity comes from above to give what human wisdom could not give—a final philosophy of its own; and in its place assumes a human faculty of testing truth to which revelation and philosophy must submit, under the postulate of 'the self-sufficiency of man for the evolution of a religion of humanity.'"

IT IS WELL TO understand your constituency. The Rev. Dr. Gray, we are informed, has been making a study of fools, and has reached this conclusion: "A fool of a Presbyterian beats all fools; and we have some of them, male and female. Not so many as the Methodists have; but ours are of a larger and more incorrigible variety." The Independent playfully comments on the above as follows: "The Methodist takes offence at the 'odious comparison,' but will probably not be 'incorrigible' when Dr. Gray explains that he evidently meant that the Methodists have more fools because there are more of them." And, in a summary way as a radical, we would venture to suggest, gentlemen, that it is possible the solution to your speculations is found in the principle of those mental states which causes persons to see in others the likeness of themselves.

THE REV. MR. WENDTE, a Unitarian clergyman, has given the names of some eminent Unitarians to a Chicago paper, and they have been copied with a natural pride into a denominational one on the other side of the water. It occurs to us it might be well for Mr. Wendte to run his eye over the list and see if it will not bear some revision. Among the names which he enumerates are Theodore Parker and O. B. Frothingham. Inasmuch as it is a well-authenticated fact that Unitarians did not pretend to claim Theodore Parker while living, it seems strange that they should do so now he is dead. Parker declares that they had so little love for him that they were accustomed to move away from him on the settees when he came into their meetings. Their ministers would not exchange with him; nor their periodicals publish anything he wrote. As for Mr. Frothingham, we believe his name was officially struck from the roll of Unitarian ministers about ten years ago. Mr. Wendte includes among the distinguished Unitarian writers the names of Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry Thoreau, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, and others. But Mr. Emerson is not a church-goer, and voluntarily left the Unitarian ministry nearly as soon as he entered it, and has had little or nothing to do with Unitarianism since, or any form of Christianity; and in consideration of the fact also that Thoreau cherished a persistent and incorrigible detestation of churches and preachers of every description, it would seem as though Mr. Wendte had been almost too eager to swell the glory of his sect by connecting great names with it,—in a word, appropriating what does not belong to him.

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The Cuneiform Legends of Chaldaea, And their Relation to the Early Hebrew Writings.

A PAPER READ BEFORE THE PHILOSOPHICAL CLUB, BROOKLYN, N.Y., FEB. 20, 1879.

BY LEWIS G. JAMES.

The labor of deciphering and translating the cuneiform inscriptions of Assyria and Babylonia, including, as it does, the discovery of their alphabet, language, grammar, and signification, constitutes one of the most noteworthy achievements of modern scholarship; "deserving," says Prof. Max Müller, "to be classed with the discoveries of a Kepler, a Newton, or a Faraday." The results of the translation of the older Assyrian inscriptions have been made public only within the last five or six years. Few, even among our theologians, have acquainted themselves with the nature of these results; and nearly all who have done so are either silent concerning their bearing upon the early legends of the Hebrew Scriptures, or, apparently, wilfully blind to the real force of the remarkable similarity between them, which no investigator can fail to recognize.

The term "cuneiform," or wedge-shaped, is descriptive of the characters in which these inscriptions are written. They are found sometimes on rocks, stone slabs, monuments, gems, and seals; but chiefly on bricks, vases, and cylinders of clay, baked hard in the sun, or dried in a kiln. On this clay, when soft, the characters seem to have been inscribed by means of a square, sharp-cornered instrument. Many of them are so small that a magnifying glass is required to distinguish and read them.

They were first discovered in modern times after being lost nearly two thousand years, by Garcia de Sylva Figueroa, ambassador of Philip III. of Spain, in the year 1688. While digging in the mines of Persepolis, he found and copied some of these inscriptions, expressing the belief that the characters constituted writing. Others deemed them to be merely talismanic signs, charms, the formulas of priests, or astronomical symbols. Thomas Hyde, a distinguished Oriental scholar of England, failing to decipher them, expressed his disgust that he had wasted so much time over them, deeming them merely the idle fancies of some architect who wished to see how many forms of a single stroke he could invent.*

They were finally admitted, however, to be writing; and fragments were imperfectly translated by various scholars, among them Grotefend, Rask, Eugène Burnouf, Spiegel, and Christian Lassen. The more recent discoveries of Layard, on the sites of ancient Nineveh and Babylon, brought to light an immense number of cylinders and tablets containing these inscriptions; and the labors of Rawlinson, Oppert, T. B. Sayce, and George Smith have resulted in giving us tolerably accurate translations, revealing the most valuable traditions in early history, astronomy, and legendary lore. These fragments seem to have constituted parts of the royal libraries of Nineveh and Babylon, which occupied, apparently, the upper chambers of the royal palaces, and on their destruction were precipitated into the lower stories in a mutilated condition.

The principal tablets, containing the Genesis legends and various astronomical and historical records, were discovered in the mound of Kouyunjik (ancient Nineveh), among the ruins of the palace of Sennacherib, who lived in the eighth century B.C., and Asshur-bani-pal, in the early part of the seventh century B.C. About this time a revival in letters seems to have occurred in Assyria, during which the great national libraries were renewed and enlarged, copies were made of older inscriptions, and a methodical arrangement of the various cylinders and tablets was instituted.

There are three different languages or styles of cuneiform writing. The latest and simplest is known as the Persian. The next, which is much more complex, containing three times the number of characters, is called the Scythian; and the oldest and most complicated, containing six or seven hundred characters, is termed the Assyrian or Babylonian. The simplest and latest seems to have ceased to be employed soon after the time of Alexander the Great, about 300 B.C., and the oldest at a much earlier date. The Genesis legends and early historical documents, to which alone reference will be made in this paper, were written in the oldest and most complex style of characters.

As to their age, the principal documents in the Assyrian language from which translations have been made, discovered in the ruins of Nineveh, must necessarily have been written prior to the destruction of that city, which occurred about 625 B.C. Internal evidence proves them to have been copies of older records, the copies having been made in the eighth and early part of the seventh centuries B.C. It is interesting to remember that this was also the period of the earliest "writing prophets" of Israel. The Genesis legends of the Pentateuch did not, according to Kuenen* and the best judgment of modern liberal scholars, take form until several centuries later.

As to the age of the earlier documents of which these records are merely copies, Mr. George Smith, the Assyriologist, a very careful and conservative scholar, thus testifies: "The Izdubar Legends, containing the story of the flood and what I believe to be the history of Nimrod, were probably written in the south of the country, and at least as early as B.C. 2000. These legends were, however, traditions before they were committed to writing, and were common in some form to all the country. The story of the Creation and Fall belongs to the upper or Akkad division of the country, and may not have been committed to writing so early as the Izdubar Legends; but even this is of great antiquity."†

Prof. J. L. Porter, of Assembly's College, Belfast, an eminent Orthodox scholar, declares that "the Assyrian tablets in their original form are at least two centuries older than Abraham, and six centuries older than Moses; while the remarkable traditions they contain are older still."‡ Sir Henry Rawlinson, one of the ablest of Oriental scholars,—the first to give an accurate translation of the older cuneiform writing,—vouches for the correctness of Smith's renderings, and ascribes to the legends which the inscriptions record an antiquity of 6000 or 7000 years B.C.§

A portion of the evidence on which these dates are based is, in brief, the record of early astronomical observations and the testimony of the copies, themselves, that the originals from which they were transferred were of the period of Uruk, king of Ur, who lived somewhere from 2250 to 2000 B.C. It is very improbable that such an admission should have been made unless it were true; as the monarchs of those days were more than willing to claim for themselves all the glory of the achievements of their own times. Moreover, inscriptions of the time of Uruk—bricks and tablets bearing his stamp—have been found, and the language in which they were written is identical with that of these inscriptions. This language had ceased to be spoken at the time when these copies were made, and was probably read only by the scribes and scholars. Various sculptures on seals and tablets of the age of Uruk, and even an earlier period, have also been discovered, which illustrate these legends and prove them to have existed at this time.¶

The Legend of the Creation.

Considering, first in order, the Legend of the Creation and its likeness to the account in Genesis, I shall present in the main the translations of Mr. Fox Talbot, modified when necessary for greater fullness and accuracy by a careful comparison with the interlinear rendering of Mr. George Smith. The Chaldean account of the Creation is inscribed on a series of clay tablets only portions of which have been saved from the ruins. The record is therefore incomplete; but its general tenor is unmistakable. A fragment of the first tablet reads:—

"When the upper region was not yet called heaven,
And the lower region was not yet called earth,
And not a plant had grown up on the earth below,
And the abyss of Hades had not opened its arms,
Then the watery chaos gave birth to all of them,
And the waters were gathered into one place."

This extract corresponds with Genesis i., 1 and 2: "In the beginning, the gods (Elohim) created the heavens and the earth. And the earth was without form, and empty, and darkness was upon the face of the deep."

The rest of the tablet is much broken. The record refers mainly to the action of the gods. A fragment reads:—

"... When order did not exist,
Then the great gods appeared also.
The gods Lahmu and Lahamu, they caused
To come also."

Mr. Smith says of this fragment: "The gods Lahmu and Lahamu are the male and female personifications of motion or production, and correspond to the moving wind or spirit in Genesis." The correlative Bible passage reads: "And the spirit of the gods moved upon the face of the waters."

Only a few incomplete fragments of the next three tablets of this series have yet been discovered. One of them evidently gives an account of the creation of dry land and its separation from the watery chaos.

The fifth tablet commences:—

"All that was done by the great gods was delightful.

Anu constructed dwellings for the gods;
He arranged constellations whose figures were like animals.
He made the year. Into four quarters he divided it.

Twelve months he established,
And marked by their constellations, three by three;
And for the days of the year he appointed festivals.

He marked the courses of the planets
That they may not do injury, and may cause no trouble.
He fixed the residences of the gods Bel and Ea with him.
And he opened the great gates in the shrouded darkness.
The fastenings were strong, on the left and on the right.
In the centre he placed luminaries;
He agitated the lower chaos, and made the moon to rise out of it;

He appointed the moon to rule over the night,
And to wander thro' the night until the shining of the day."

The translation of the remainder of this tablet is so uncertain that I will not attempt to reproduce it. Mr. Fox Talbot, apparently allowing his preconception and desire to influence the result, makes it include the establishment of the seventh day as a holy assembly day when all should cease from labor; while Mr. George Smith, whom I should judge to be a more careful and reliable authority, translates it simply as describing the quartering of the moon. The fragment concludes with an account of the creation of the sun (the god Shamas) to rule the day.

So far as reliably translated, this account corresponds very nearly with Genesis i., 14-19, the fourth day of the creation: "And the gods said, Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs and for seasons, and for days and years. And let them be for lights in the firmament of heaven to give light upon the earth; and it was so. And the gods made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; they made the stars also. And the gods set them in the firmament of heaven to give light upon the earth and to rule over the day and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkness: and the gods saw that it was good."

The principal differences in the two accounts are, that in the Chaldean legend the greater prominence is given to the moon, which is represented as created first; while in the Hebrew record, the sun, "the greater light," has the precedence. In the Chaldean tablet, the account opens with the expression: "All that was made by the great gods was delightful"; which corresponds with the close of the Hebrew version: "And the gods saw that it was good." This correspondence and difference run through the entire account of the creation; each Chaldean tablet opening with this expression, while its equivalent closes the record of each creative day in the Hebrew version.

A portion of the seventh tablet of this series reads:—

"When the gods in their assembly had created the earth,
And they had created also the delightful leviathans,
They caused the cattle of the field to be living creatures,
And the beasts of the field and the creeping things of the field.

They fixed habitations for the living creatures;
For the cattle and creeping things of the city they fixed abodes."

This corresponds with the account of the sixth day of creation, in Genesis i., 24 and 25: "And the gods said: Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind; and it was so. And the gods made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and everything that creepeth upon the earth after his kind; and the gods saw that it was good."

It will be noticed that the three different kinds of living creatures are distinguished in the Chaldean record precisely as in Genesis. The remainder of this tablet, which evidently gave an account of the creation of man, is, unfortunately, too fragmentary for translation; but the next tablet presents an address to man and woman on their respective duties, which is also much mutilated. It includes a reference to what is to be eaten, and perhaps contained the prohibition against partaking of the forbidden fruit, corresponding with the Genesis legend. Very ancient Assyrian and Chaldean sculptures have been discovered, representing a tree with fruit; a man and woman on either side, with hands extended toward the fruit, and a serpent behind the woman.

The Sabbath Day.

Although the fifth tablet of the creation series does not probably contain any reference to the institution of the Sabbath, there is no doubt that the religious recognition not of every seventh day but of the seventh day of each month, as a day of rest, was a very old custom among the Chaldeans and Assyrians, originating before the time of Abraham, before the Hebrew nation came into existence. Mr. Smith says elsewhere: "In the year 1869, I discovered among other things a curious religious calendar of the Assyrians, in which every month is divided into four weeks, and the seventh days or 'Sabbaths' are marked out as days on which no work should be undertaken." This appears to be the same calendar, a portion of which has been thus translated by Rev. A. H. Sayce:—

"The seventh day. A feast of Merodach and Zir-panitu, a festival.

A day of the completion of labors. The prince of many nations

The flesh of birds and cooked fruit does not eat.

He changes not the garments of his body. He puts not on white robes,

He legislates not in royal fashion.

The general appoints not a place of garrison;

He applies not medicine for his sickness of body.

It is suitable to make a sacred spot.

In the night, in the presence of Merodach and Ishtar,

The king makes his offering. Sacrifices he offers;

Raising his hand, he worships the high places of the gods."

The nineteenth and twenty-eighth days of each month are commanded to be recognized in precisely the same terms. It would seem most probable that in Assyria and Chaldea, as in Palestine, the Sabbath was first instituted, as herein intimated, for a day of rest and worship. This agrees with the declaration in the book of Covenants, an ancient fragment of the Pentateuch, the oldest Hebrew document wherein it is mentioned: "Six days shalt thou do thy work, and on the seventh day thou shalt rest: that thine ox and thine ass may rest, and the son of thy handmaid and the stranger may be refreshed." (Ex. xxiii., 12.) The Deuteronomist who wrote later repeated this reason and added another to this command for Sabbath observance; because Yahweh, "by a mighty hand and an outstretched arm" had brought Israel out of Egypt. (Deut. v.) The connection of this command with the creation seems to have been the subsequent invention of a later writer in the Pentateuch, the author of the book of Origins, and cannot be traced to the Chaldean records.

The Fall of Man.

Another tablet of the Creation series gives an account of the fall of man, into which the serpent or dragon, Tiamat, enters. Unfortunately, this is very fragmentary; but in some respects it is clearly in accord with the Genesis legend. Man is first spoken of as pure and holy:—

"He made man. The breath of life was in him.

The doing of evil shall not come out of him;
Established in the company of the gods, he rejoiceth their heart.

The dragon Tiamat tempted him. . . .
The god Ea heard and was angry,
Because his man had corrupted his purity."

Then a curse is pronounced upon man for his disobedience.

"The god Ea, the Lord of all the earth, called out his name,
And in the ranks of the angels pronounced his curse:

May he be punished, as I declare;
May the course of his issue be cut off;
May all of his seed be destroyed.

May he be conquered, and at once cut off;
May wisdom and knowledge injure him;
May father and son be put at enmity,
And may they plunder and destroy each other;

May they make Merodach, the Lord of the gods, angry.
May the land bring forth, but man not touch it.
His desire shall be cut off, and his wish unanswered.
His back shall be broken and not be healed.
In his urgent trouble no god shall receive him,
His heart shall be broken and his mind be troubled;
To sin and wrong his face shall come."

The main features of the Chaldean accounts of the creation and fall of man are thus seen to correspond with the Genesis records. The creative process advances in six distinct stages, and their order is identical with the first account in Genesis. In various fragments of the inscriptions man is called Admi or Adami, which is precisely the term used in the Bible. In the Chaldean legend, however, it is always represented as a common designation applicable to the race, and never as a proper name. It is also sometimes used in this sense in Genesis; i.e., "Male and female created he them, and blessed them, and called their name Adam." (Gen. v., 2.) Sir Henry Rawlinson says that the Chaldeans recognized two principal races of men: the Adamu or dark race, which was the race that fell; and the Sarku or light race, who retained their holiness. Traces of this legend are recognizable in the Bible, two races being there mentioned: the sons of Adam and the sons of God. In one place we are told that they actually intermarried: "The sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair, and took to themselves wives of all which they chose." (Gen. vi., 2.)

The dragon, Tiamat, in the Chaldean legend, seems to perform the same office as the serpent in Genesis; but in the inscriptions his history is given at much greater length, and his appearance as a tempter is less abrupt and unnatural. He was the personification of the original chaos of waters out of which the universe was created. He is recognised as identical with the Thalath of Berossus, the Babylonian historian, and akin to Θαλάσσια, the sea, of Greek literature. This dragon, the genius of Chaos, was at war with the gods and the divine principle of order from the beginning. After the fall of man, the god Bel, Merodach or Elu, attacks Tiamat and finally vanquishes him; a legendary event which was a favorite subject of Assyrian and Babylonian sculpture, but has been strangely misinterpreted by the author of the Apocryphal book, Bel and the Dragon, wherein both Bel and the Dragon are represented as gods who were worshipped by the Babylonians; which is very much as if we should say that Orthodox Christians worshipped equally Christ and the devil.

Introductory to the Creation legends is a curious account of a conflict between the gods in heaven, and the fall of the rebellious deities in whose place man is created. There are other legends in which serpents and animals are made to speak; reminding the reader of the talking serpent in Genesis, and the story of Balaam in Numbers.

The Flood.

Equal in interest to the Genesis legends of Chaldea, are those contained in a remarkable series of twelve tablets which recount the exploits of a mythical hero whose name has not yet been correctly deciphered, but whom Mr. George Smith calls, provisionally, Izdubar. The eleventh tablet of this series contains the Chaldean story of the deluge, which is related to Izdubar by Hasisadra, or Silt, the Chaldean Noah, who has been translated and become as one of the gods. The account is not perfect, but is much less mutilated than the Creation tablets, so that there is no difficulty in discovering the main features of the story. I shall present it somewhat at length, mainly in the translation of Mr. George Smith. The god Ea thus orders Hasisadra to build the ark:—

"Son of Ubaratum,
Make a ship after this manner;
For I will destroy the sinner and the life. . . .
Cause all of the seed of life
To go into the midst of the ship. . . .

The ship which thou shalt make,
Six hundred cubits shall be the measure of its length,
And sixty cubits the amount of its breadth and height.
Into the deep launch it. . . .

I perceived, and said to Ea, 'My Lord,
Making the ship which thou hast commanded me,
When it is made, young and old will deride me,'
Ea opened his mouth and spake,

And said unto me, his servant:—

"The flood shall come which I will send to you."
Strong was the ship.

On the fifth day* I completed it.
I placed planks against the water within it.
Three measures of bitumen I poured over the outside.
Three measures of bitumen I poured over the inside.

The men constructed ovens.
I placed in them the offering for the sacrifices.
Two measures of boxes I distributed to the boatmen.

Wine in a receptacle I collected, like the waters of a river;
Also food, like the dust of the earth. . . .

The material of the ship was completed.
The rudders of the ship I caused to be placed above and below.

All I possessed; all I possessed of silver,
All I possessed of gold; all I possessed of the seed of life,—
The whole I caused to go up into the midst of the ship;
All my male servants and my female servants,
The beast of the field, the animal of the field,
The sons of my people,—all of them I caused to go up.
Shama-t made a flood, and he spake to me, saying:—
'In the night I will cause it to rain heavily.
Enter into the ship and shut thy door.'

The flood happened of which he spake, saying:—
'In the night it will rain from heaven heavily.
During the day I celebrated his festival;
I had a day of watching and of fear.
I entered into the midst of the ship and shut my door.

The cloud-gods rose,
From the horizon of heaven extending far and wide.
Vul in the midst of it thundered,
And Nebot and Saro went forward;
The throne-bearers went over mountains and plains.
The destroyer, Nergal, § overturned.
Ninip went forward and cast down.
The storm-gods carried destruction,
In their glory they swept the earth.

The flood of Vul reached to heaven,
The bright earth was turned to a waste.
It swept the surface of the earth like a besom,
It destroyed all life from the face of the earth.
The strong deluge covered the people and reached to heaven.

Brother saw not brother, people knew not each other;
In heaven the gods heard the tempest and sought refuge;
They ascended to the upper heaven of Ann,
The gods like dogs in droves lay prostrate.

Ishtar spake like a child,
Rubat uttered her speech:
All to corruption was turned; and then I
In the presence of the gods prophesied evil,
All my people were devoted to evil. Thus I prophesied:
I have begotten my people, and like the young
Of the fishes they fill the sea.

The gods wept with her concerning the dead ones,
The gods were seated with lamentations;
Their lips were covered for the coming evil.

Six days and nights passed.
The wind, deluge, and storm overwhelmed the earth.
On the seventh day the storm was calmed in its course,
And all the deluge which had destroyed
Like an earthquake was quieted.

It passed. I sat down and wept,
My tears flowed over my face.

I perceived the shore at the end of the sea.

The agreements and differences of the Chaldean and Hebrew stories are now easily established. In the command to build the ark, or ship, and the reason therefor,—the sin of the world,—and in the declaration that it should therefore be destroyed by a flood, the two accounts agree. They also agree as to the general structure of the ark, and especially in the statement that it was coated within and without with bitumen or pitch. The records of the animals taken into it and of the sending forth of the birds agree in the main, though not wholly in detail. There is a similar agreement as to the erection of an altar and the offering of a sacrifice, after the abatement of the flood.

In respect to the dimensions of the ark, the number of people and animals taken into it, and the duration of the deluge, there are manifest points of disagreement. The two accounts of the flood in Genesis also differ in the latter particulars; the Elohist version making the total duration of the deluge one year and ten days, and representing that all the animals were taken into the ark in pairs, while the Yahwistic document makes it forty days, and the clean beasts are represented as selected by sevens. It will be observed that the Chaldean version is much fuller in details than the Hebrew. It seems evident that the two accounts had a common origin. Their agreements would otherwise be inconceivable, while the modifications of the Genesis version are such as would naturally flow from the different treatment of the Hebrew writers. Canon Tristram, of England, accepting the Chaldean account as a verification of the deluge as a historical fact, argues that it renders it necessary to place the date of its occurrence at least one thousand years earlier than heretofore.

The Tower of Babel.

The Hebrew legend of the tower of Babel and the confusion of tongues is too familiar to require repetition. The ruins known as Birs Nimrod, or the tower of Nimrod, supposed to be identical with Babel, are the remains of a structure near the site of Babylon which seems to have been commenced at a very early period; and remained for centuries in an unfinished condition, until its completion by Nebuchadrezzar, about 600 B.C. In an inscription of Nebuchadrezzar we find this fragmentary allusion to it:—

"The tower, the eternal house which I founded and built,
The first story, which is the house of the earth's base,
The most ancient monument of Babylon,
I built and finished it. We say for the other, that is this edifice.

The house of the seven lights of the earth,
The most ancient monument of Borsippa;
A former king built it, forty-two ages ago,
But he did not complete its head.
Since a remote time people had abandoned it,
Without order expressing their words.
I did not change the site
Nor take away the foundation of it.
I set my hand to finish it and to exalt its head. As it was in former times,
So I founded it, I made it. As it was in ancient days,
So I exalted its summit."

The translation of the lines, "Since a remote time people had abandoned it, without order expressing their words," is exceedingly doubtful. Mr. Talbot renders the same passage: "From extreme old age it had rotted away. The water-springs beneath it had not been kept in order."†

On a fragment of a tablet found by Mr. George Smith, we have a still earlier allusion to the tower. It is considerably mutilated, but reads, according to his translation, somewhat as follows:—

"Of man spake Elu, the father of gods:
He declared of him that his heart was evil.
The father of all the gods he turned from....
Babylon corruptly went to sin,
And small and great mingled on the mound.

Their strong tower all day they founded;
To their stronghold at night entirely he made an end,
In his anger also he poured out his word.
He set his face to scatter them abroad,
He gave his command. Their counsel was confused,†
... Their progress he impeded."

When finally completed, the tower comprised seven pyramidal stories, dedicated to the moon and sun and five planets, and surmounted by a sanctuary of the god Bel. There is no intimation in these inscriptions that the object in building it was to escape some future flood, as in the Bible story. The only supposed allusions to a "confusion of tongues" are presented in the doubtful and obscurely translated phrase: "The people abandoned it, without order expressing their words," which is rendered quite differently by Mr. Fox Talbot, and in the other line, "Their counsel was confused."

*A few words have been supplied in mutilated portions, where the sense was unmistakable.

I do not think these statements are sufficiently explicit to warrant the inference that they agree with the Bible legend of the confusion of tongues. All that we can safely infer from them is, that, owing to some disagreement or "confusion of counsels," the labor was abandoned.

The Hebrew legend seems to have grown out of a sort of primitive pun, or play upon words, with reference to the name Babel. The Chaldean meaning of the word is "the gate of El, or Il"; literally, "the gate of god." The Hebrews confounded it with their somewhat similar word balal, or bilbel, which means "to confuse"; and out of this misinterpretation and the unfinished condition of the tower grew the legend of the confusion of tongues,† an event which has absolutely no support in historical evidence, and gains no probability from the known history of language.‡

Izdubar-Nimrod.

Mr. George Smith enters into a labored argument in support of the proposition that the hero of the twelve tablets, in the eleventh of which the deluge story is recorded, and whose name has not been translated, but whom he calls, provisionally, Izdubar, is identical with the Bible character Nimrod.§ Now, literally, all the information that we have concerning Nimrod, elsewhere, is found in Genesis x., 8, 9, and 10; which reads as follows:—

"And Cush begat Nimrod: he began to be a mighty one in the earth. He was a mighty hunter before Yahweh: wherefore it is said, even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before Yahweh. And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar."

This seems to be very insufficient information on which to build an argument in favor of the identity of Nimrod either with any historical personage, or with the mythical Izdubar. The history of the latter is very extensive; comprising, originally, twelve closely written cuneiform tablets. He is represented as dwelling in the vicinity of Accad, possessing great physical strength, which he exercises in slaying animals and giants; and as entering upon a series of curious adventures, which are described in detail.

The probability in respect to Nimrod is, that his story is simply generic. It implies that the first State ever founded was in the region of the Euphrates; and comprised the cities named in the text. Its founders were of Cushite or Ethiopian origin. This is all that we can legitimately deduce from the Bible record, and even this is of somewhat uncertain import.||

Izdubar-Samsa'n.

Although we cannot establish the identity of Izdubar and Nimrod, there are many striking points of resemblance between the Chaldean hero and another Bible character, the Hebrew Hercules, Samson.

For instance, the word Samson (Hebrew Shimshon) means "The sun."¶ Shamas, or Samas, is also the name of the sun-god of the Chaldeans; and he is represented as the father and especial protector of the mythical hero, Izdubar.**

Izdubar, like Samson, is represented as possessing very great strength, which he exercises in combats with his enemies. He also attacks single-handed, and easily slays, a lion which he meets in his path. Izdubar strangling or tearing the lion is a frequent subject in very ancient Chaldean and Assyrian sculpture.

Izdubar, like Samson, is also represented with very long hair, and is easily distinguished by this peculiarity from other figures in the ancient sculptures. He is made ill, or caused to lose his strength, by the influence of Anatu, the mother of Ishtar; and this loss of strength is accompanied by a loss of his hair. This corresponds somewhat with the story of Delliah, in the Hebrew record. With the return of health and strength, his hair grows again. The inscription reads:—

"He restored the hair of his head, Hanging down to cover the cloak of his body."

One of the titles or designations of the sun-god Samas, among the Chaldeans, was Dayan-misi, "the judge of men";†† and it is noteworthy that Samson was reckoned among the Hebrew judges.

The True Significance of the Izdubar Legends.

Observing the similarity between the stories of Izdubar and Samson, and recollecting that Kuesen, Oort, and other liberal scholars had already traced the mythical elements which have clustered around some possible Danite hero, in the story of Samson, to their origin in a solar myth, I was led to investigate more carefully as to the true significance of the Izdubar legends. Though some of the tablets of this series are fragmentary or wanting, I am satisfied from the study of what has already been deciphered and translated, that the entire series of Izdubar tablets, including the story of the flood, constitute the original record of a solar myth, which represents the passage of the sun through the twelve constellations of the zodiac, and that the Samson††† mythology is a shrunken and modified version of the same legends.

†††For an interesting analysis of the Samson myth, see The Historical Poetry of the Ancient Hebrews. Vol. I. By Michael Heliophin.

Tracing the myth as far as we are able, we find the fragments of the first tablet which would represent the passage of the sun through the constellation of Aries (Assyrian, Sara-ziggar, "the sacrifice of righteousness"*) very uncertainly indicated. The fragments provisionally selected by Mr. Smith are those marked K 3200, in the British Museum, which contain references to Izdubar and Ishtar, the conquest of Erech by some enemy, and the flight of the gods and spirits to the sanctuaries of the great gods.† The month of March was dedicated to Anu and Bel in the Assyrian calendar.‡

The April passage through the constellation of Taurus (Assyrian, Khar-sidi, "the propitious bull"§) is evidently indicated by the episode of the friendship of Izdubar with Heabani, a mythical being who is often represented in ancient sculptures with the chest and face of a man, and the horns and lower extremities of an ox or bull. Heabani is first introduced in the second tablet (marked K 3389) precisely in the correct order of the constellations, in the character of a recluse or hermit, who is induced after much solicitation by the god Samas (the sun) to visit Izdubar and interpret a remarkable dream,—that the stars fell down from heaven and struck him upon the back. The reluctance of Heabani to visit Izdubar illustrates the gradual conquest of winter by spring during the month of April. This month of showers is appropriately dedicated to Hea, the Assyrian Neptune,* whose name also appears in that of the hermit Heabani.

The Assyrian designation for the May constellation (our Gemini) is Munga, which signifies "made of bricks."¶ This may refer to the temple of Ellitardus which is mentioned in the third tablet, or to the dwelling of Izdubar. This tablet also contains a phrase which is translated "Heabani had made himself a mountain."† It is noticeable that the Assyrian name for this sign bears no relation to our Gemini, "the twins." This tablet, however, gives an account of the two women Harimtu and Samhali who entice Heabani to leave his solitude, which episode would fairly illustrate the conception of the twins. This month is dedicated to the Moon-god, Sin or Uru, in the Assyrian calendar.‡

The June passage into summer heat is not so clearly indicated, the fragments of the fourth tablet being in a wretchedly broken condition. The Assyrian name for this constellation is Su-Kul-na, "the seizer of seed,"* and the inscription on this tablet appears to relate chiefly to Izdubar's preparation for the conflict with the mythical giant, Humbaba, who dwells beyond a forest of magnificent trees through which he journeys. The identity of these fragments with this tablet is somewhat uncertain.

The Assyrian name for the fifth constellation (our Leo) is Ab abagar, "fire that makes fire."¶ The fragments assigned to this tablet by Mr. Smith give an account of the conquest of Humbaba, his death, and the return of Izdubar. The description of the conflict of Izdubar with the lion, which is alluded to in other fragments and frequently illustrated in Assyrian and Chaldean sculpture, may not improbably be assigned to this tablet, thus suggesting and illustrating the conception of Leo. The month of July was dedicated to the goddess Allat, "the queen of the spear."‡

The sixth tablet is in much better condition than the preceding ones, and gives a connected account of the wooing of Izdubar by Ishtar, the goddess of the planet Venus. It comes precisely in the right order to illustrate the sixth Assyrian constellation of the zodiac, Ki gingir-na, "the errand of Ishtar,"* corresponding appropriately with our virgo, "the virgin." This month, August, is dedicated to Ishtar in the Assyrian calendar.

The Assyrian designation for the seventh constellation, our Libra, is Tul-cu, "the holy altar."¶ This tablet opens with the words: "Friend, why do the gods take counsel?" It is uncertain whether any other fragments have been discovered; but Mr. Smith assigns, provisionally, to this tablet a remarkable account of the descent of the goddess Ishtar into Hades. This month (September) was dedicated to the sun-god, Samas.*

The Assyrians called the eighth constellation, our Scorpio, Apin an a, "the bull-like founder."‡ The assignment of fragments to this tablet is uncertain and provisional. An account of the struggle of Izdubar with the divine bull of Ishtar found on certain fragments of this series may belong here, and also the story of the illness of Izdubar, which Mr. Smith provisionally assigns to this tablet.

Elsewhere he declares: "On a fragment of a tablet which I found at Kouyunjik the star of the scorpion is said to belong to the eighth month, in which, of course, it would naturally appear."§ This would seem to indicate that the story of the meeting of Izdubar with the scorpion-men, "burning with terrible heat, their appearance like death," which he provisionally assigns to the next tablet, more properly belongs to this. These mythical beings are often represented in company with Izdubar on ancient Chaldean sculpture, possessing the head of a scorpion and the body and limbs of a man; or sometimes reversedly, with a man's head and the lower extremities of a scorpion. This month was dedicated to Merodach or Bel.*

The Assyrian name for the ninth constellation was Gan gamma, "the very cloudy."¶ The fragments assigned to the ninth tablet are very imperfect, but seem to give an account of the sorrow of Izdubar at the death of Heabani. We have discovered no trace of any representation corresponding with our Sagittarius, "the archer"; but it would find ready illustration in some exploit of archery by "the mighty hunter,"—some ancient version perhaps of the William Tell myth. This month was dedicated to Nergal, the god of war or archery.*

The tenth constellation, our Capricornus, was termed by the Assyrians Abba uddu, "the father of light."† The fragments assigned to this tablet give an account of the embarkation of Isdubar with Urhaimi in a ship, and his voyage to Surippak, "the city of the ark," where he meets Hasadsra, the Chaldean Noah. The month of December was dedicated to Papsucul in the Assyrian calendar.*

The Assyrians termed the eleventh constellation As a-m, "abundance of rain,"‡ which would correspond with our Aquarius. The famous eleventh tablet, with its story of the flood, coming exactly in the right place, would emphatically typify the advent of the rainy season and the passage of the sun through this constellation. The month of January was dedicated to Rimmon.*

The Assyrian name for the February constellation, our Pisces, was Se ki sil, "the sowing of seed."† The twelfth and final tablet of the Isdubar series has been certainly identified, and contains the account of the resurrection of Heabani from the earth; a fact which is here typified, as in the writings of Paul, by the sowing of seed and the growth of the plant or grain.

When it is remembered that Samas, or Shamas, the sun-god, is represented as accompanying Isdubar through all his adventures as his father and constant protector, the character of these legends as a solar myth seems to be clearly indicated. The names of the constellations are frequently different from those which we have adopted from the Greek mythology, but the sources from which the latter were derived seem, nevertheless, to be sometimes suggested in the text of the inscriptions. In the story of Samson; we have the legend one remove further from its original purity, and possibly intermingled with the history of some real Danite hero; but if so, he is now hidden and obscured, both as to his true name and as to his deeds, by the easily discernible characteristics of solar mythology.

The account of the translation of Hasadsra, the Chaldean Noah, after the flood, also confirms our conclusion as to the solar origin of these legends, typifying, as it does, like the Hebrew story of Enoch, the passing away of the solar year.

There are other minor incidents related in the Isdubar tablets which sustain this conclusion: as, for instance, his remarkable dream, to which several references are made in the inscriptions, that the stars fell down from heaven and struck him upon the back. This probably represents the setting of the constellations in the west, following in the path of the vanished sun.

It is a significant fact that the tablets on which these legends are inscribed, when discovered were mingled with the remains of others, the inscriptions upon which are of an unquestionable astronomical and astrological character. Chaldaea, as is well known, was the earliest home of the science of astronomy. Here the heavens were mapped into constellations, and eclipses were accurately calculated ages before the rise of Greek and Roman civilization. In astronomy the Chaldeans excelled even the Egyptians.‡ Calisthenes, a writer who accompanied Alexander the Great, at the time of his conquest of Babylon, reported that he found there recorded the calculations of eclipses dating back more than nineteen hundred years, or to the twenty-third century B.C. It is from similar records that the great age of some of these inscriptions has been accurately determined.

The description of the composite creatures, winged bulls, scorpion men, and Heabani, with the horns and lower extremities of a bull or ox, is sufficient to stamp them as wholly mythical, legendary, and unhistorical. In some very ancient inscriptions we find Isdubar represented as a god to whom prayers are offered. His correct name, as Mr. Smith admits, has not yet been deciphered. I venture to predict that when it shall be, it will be found to be, not Nimrod as he argues, but some equivalent of Dian-nis, Dionysus, or Adonis, the incarnate sun-god; whose worship, beginning in Assyria, is traceable through nearly all the mythologies of antiquity.‡ He was the Aten of the Egyptian religion and the Adonai of the Hebrews. His worship in this region is recognized in a fragmentary inscription of Nebuchadnezzar, one line of which reads:—

"To the sun, the judge supreme, the temple of Dian-nis,§ his temple I grandly built."

The story of the wooing of Isdubar by Ishtar, the goddess of the planet Venus, is identical in its general character and meaning with the myth of Venus and Adonis; and the notable and highly poetical account of the descent of Ishtar into Hades, which is related in another tablet, strongly resembles the Greek mythological legend of the descent of the goddess Ceres or Demeter into Hades. This conclusion, by which the Isdubar legends are identified as a solar myth, was forced upon me originally during my investigation of Mr. George Smith's translations by my recognition of the probable identity of Isdubar and Samson. This identity, plain as it appears,

I have not seen anywhere suggested; but the ultimate conclusion that the Isdubar legends constitute the record of a solar myth,* I have since discovered to be in accordance with the opinion of that eminent Oriental scholar and student of the cuneiform inscriptions,—Sir Henry Rawlinson.†

Sargon-Moses.

In the Hebrew records at the period of Moses, we reach a time when actual history is blending with myth and legend. There is little doubt of the reality of Moses as a historical personage. His name (Musd) is found in Egyptian inscriptions as well as in the Bible. Yet it is evident from the fact that the earliest writing prophets of the eighth century B.C. mention his name but once,‡ that his position and influence were greatly exaggerated by later writers; and from the predominance of magical and miraculous elements in the stories concerning him, that the record is by no means reliable. It is quite likely that the account of his concealment by his mother in an ark of bulrushes is wholly mythical, a similar legend being related of the Akkadian king Sargon, who lived about three hundred years before the time of Moses. A fragmentary inscription of Sargon, discovered and translated by Mr. George Smith, reads as follows:—

"I am Sargon, the powerful king of Akkad.
My mother was a princess; my father I did not know.
A brother of my father ruled over the country.
In the city of Azupiranu,
Sitting on the river Euphrates,
My mother, the princess, conceived me.
In difficulty she brought me forth.
She placed me in an ark of rushes;
With bitumen she sealed up my exit.
She launched me upon the river;
The river did not drown me.
The river bore me onward;
To Akki, the water-carrier, it brought me.
The water-carrier, in tenderness of bowels
Lifted me out of the river.
The water-carrier as his child brought me up.
The water-carrier made me his husbandman,
And in my husbandry Ishtar prospered me.
Forty-five years the kingdom I have ruled;
The people of the dark races I have governed."

The name Sargon means "the established," or, as we should say, the de facto king; and both the Assyrian and Akkadian Sargons are known to have been usurpers. This story appears very much like the invention of the king after he acquired power, in order to establish the claim for his descent from a royal line. It would seem to indicate that Sargon wished to convey the impression that the former king, being his uncle and fearing his rivalry or claims upon the throne, desired to destroy him in his infancy, and his mother took this method of saving his life. The alleged length of his reign corresponds somewhat with that of the leadership of Moses. These correspondences are evidently recognized by Mr. Smith, who terms Sargon "the Babylonian Moses."§

Oannes-Jonah.

The story of Jonah and the whale has long been a stumbling-block in the way of those who argue for the plenary inspiration and literal interpretation of the Old Testament. According to Kuenen,|| Oort,|| and other liberal critics, the book of Jonah was not written until after the time of Ezra; and there is no evidence that the ninth-century prophet, Jonah the son of Amittai, ever preached or prophesied in Nineveh. The legend of the whale, or "great fish" as the Old Testament calls it, was probably suggested to the unknown writer of the book by the sculptured representations of the god, or mythical being, Oannes, who is always pictured with the trunk and limbs of a man, emerging, as it were, from the body of a fish.

In the works of Berossus, the Babylonian historian, who gathered up and translated into Greek many of these ancient legends, mention is made of this composite being, half fish and half man, who was supposed to have risen out of the sea and taught the Babylonians all their science and learning. The legend passed over into Assyria, and the sculpture is common in the ruins of Nineveh and other Assyrian cities. The similarity of the names, Oannes and Jonah, and the reverence in which Oannes was held by the Ninevites and Babylonians, served the purpose of the Hebrew writer; and out of this mythical representation he probably evolved the story of the prophet and the fish. It was characteristic of the Hebrews to think that "no good thing could come out of" Nineveh, or go into it, unless sent there by Yahweh, their god. The writer of the book of Jonah seized upon this legend and gave it his own interpretation, in the same spirit in which Paul afterwards declared unto the Athenians "the Unknown God," to whom they, in their great religiousness, had erected an altar.¶

The Relation of the Chaldean to the Hebrew Legends.

Presuming that the marked similarity of these early Chaldean legends to those embodied in the Pentateuch is noteworthy that Herakles, or Heracles, the incarnate sun-god of Greek mythology, was identified with Samson by so eminent a Christian writer as St. Augustine. See History of Rationalism in Europe. By W. E. H. Lecky.

†Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia. By Rawlinson and Norris. Scholars have also traced the story of Nimrod to an ancient Babylonian myth; a writer in the New American Cyclopædia declaring that "he is supposed to have been the chief of Semitic theology answering to the Orion of the Greeks, and in Hebrew astronomy to the constellation of that name." (Article Nimrod, Appletons' Cyclopædia.) At all events, we must consider his history as merely generically impersonal and unhistorical.

teach is now evident, and that the unchallenged testimony of eminent scholars, whether of Orthodox or Liberal faith, as to the age of the Chaldean narratives is admitted as conclusive, and discarding as wholly irrational and unsupported the current Orthodox theory of a pre-biblical and pre-historic supernatural revelation, there seem to be only two hypotheses on which to account for this remarkable agreement. Either the Chaldeans and Hebrews arrived independently at this information, whether it be fact or legend, concerning the cosmogony of the universe and the early history of mankind, the one unaided, and the other, as it is claimed, by miraculous inspiration,—a supposition not very complimentary to the Hebrews or to the inspiration theory,—or, discarding the notion of miracle, the Israelites themselves borrowed these legends from Chaldean and Assyria, weaving them into the Bible narratives, with such changes of names and circumstances as were suggested by the different purposes which animated them and the varying conditions under which they wrote.

Upon this question, Mr. George Smith, a very conservative investigator, thus testifies:—

"Did either of the two races, Jews or Babylonians, borrow from the other the traditions of these early times, and if so, when?"

"There is one point in connection with this question worth noticing: these traditions are not fixed to any localities near Palestine, but are, even on the showing of the Jews themselves, fixed to the neighborhood of the Euphrates valley, and Babylon in particular; this, of course, is clearly stated in the Babylonian inscriptions and traditions."

"Eden, according even to the Jews, was by the Euphrates and Tigris; the cities of Babylon, Sarracha, and Sippara were supposed to have been founded before the flood. Surippak was the city of the ark, the mountains east of the Tigris were the resting-place of the ark, and Ur of the Chaldees the birth-place of Abraham. These facts, and the further statement that Abraham, the father and first leader of the Hebrew race, migrated from Ur to Haran in Syria, and from thence to Palestine, are all so much evidence in favor of the hypothesis that Chaldaea was the original home of these stories, and that the Jews received them originally from the Babylonians."

"It is possible"—says Dr. Oort—"that when the Israelites came into contact with the Syrians and Assyrians, they picked up a certain cosmogony from them, and that the writer of this narrative (of the creation) worked it up in accordance with his own ideas, and gave an Israelite tinge to the stories."†

A recent writer in the Pall Mall Gazette, combating the view which holds the Chaldean records to be in some mysterious and incomprehensible way corroborative of the historical accuracy of these early Bible narratives, declares:—

"The early Hagiological literature of the Hebrews is now shown to be a local version of a literature extensively diffused over the whole of Middle Asia. That part of it written in Phœnician characters was never lost, and was widely diffused in spite of the varying fortunes of the race which preserved it. That part of it which was written in cuneiform letters on stone perished for awhile when the great cities of Mesopotamia were overthrown; but, now that it has been recovered by modern learning, it proves to set forth substantially the same legends which have been so long and so familiarly known to us...."

"If there had been no Old Testament, several of the marvellous, supernatural stories which Mr. George Smith interpreted from the fragments of stone which he pieced together would have been at once set aside as having no claim to be received as historical truth, whatever else might be their interest. They would have been classed with the Hagiological literature spread in many diverse forms over the vast country of India, or with the legends which fill the infancy of Greece or Rome."‡

This seems to be the only rational conclusion to which the unbiased student of this literature can come. Even if we should accept the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, we would still be compelled to admit that these legends, existing and committed to writing before the time of Abraham, and refreshed in the recollection of the Hebrews by each subsequent contact with the Assyrians, must have been thus communicated, and handed down from generation to generation. But few writers with any pretence to scholarship now fail to concede that, even if Moses was the original writer in the Pentateuch, there is conclusive internal evidence that it was reviewed and greatly augmented by a later hand.

It is noteworthy that we have, in the Pentateuch, different and contradictory versions of some of these legends, including the accounts of the creation and the flood. Dean Stanley concedes that the two accounts of the creation "differ at nearly every point of time and circumstance."§ The older, resembling least the Chaldean traditions, is in the manuscript of the Yahwist writer, while the nobler and simpler

The Index.

BOSTON, JULY 10, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of Liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

UNITY OF SPIRIT.

It will be perceived from what has gone before that there are certain general principles essential to the coöperation and unification of rationalism, in order that it may become the religion of humanity. These simply and succinctly stated are, first, comprehensiveness; second, absolute reason; third, purity. Of course there is much implied in this summary which a strict definition of the terms employed might not include. But these, under all circumstances, irrespective of special issues and phases of development, must constitute the fundamentals of a new order of life and thought designed to supersede what has existed. They are the sine qua non to the fulfilment of all such aspirations and aims. Without them as inherent ruling and shaping principles, there can be no great inclusive and progressive combination of radicals. They must be content to exist very largely as hostile camps, and wear their energies away in criticism and destructive effort. They must pursue their course according to their special idiosyncrasies, in a more or less desultory and unmethodical way, without harmony or concert of action, and leave much of the noblest and most pressing work of the world, which none are so well fitted to execute as themselves, to be performed by clumsy theological methods and in the spirit of sectarian selfishness and narrowness.

It is plain, therefore, that the first thing needed in order to secure to rationalism its greatest practical effectiveness, to render it the all-conquering and subduing movement of the future, is a more sympathetic and fraternal relation among its constituency. The Church affords in its history and present condition a striking illustration of this. The great weakness of the Church in modern times, in its efforts to conquer the world, has consisted in its sectarian divisions. There was a period when its dominion was everywhere supreme; when its restless tides, mighty as the engulfing waves of the sea, swept before it all opposition. We should not wish for that time to return. The present we believe to be infinitely superior. It was one of gross darkness, ignorance, cruelty, and superstition. But there was one great characteristic of the Church of that time which we may contemplate with instruction. It was that of universality, system, a harmonious order of action. It is this which gives to the transmitted, existing, organized type of the Church of that time the stupendous sway and influence which it exercises in the modern world.

Is there not in this example of the past, nay of the present also, a hint for rationalism to-day? The secret of power and conquest in this particular is the same for it that it was in the Church of the Middle Ages. We are aware that there are those whose rationalism is so irrational that any analogies drawn from religion of any description, or suggestion of instruction from such a source, for the promotion of the ends of rationalism, is pretty sure to put them into a state of excited mental and spiritual perturbation that renders it hopeless for one to try to make them see what else were most obvious. They forget that there are certain principles in the world that operate the same even under opposite conditions, and that whereas their operation in the one instance may be unequivocally pernicious, in the other it may be most beneficent. The principle of unity, then, we maintain must be in the future, as it has been in the past, the first prerequisite of power and progress. Sectarianism in rationalism is as disastrous to its progress and prosperity as sectarianism in the Church to the triumph of Christianity. Let us not be misapprehended. Far be it from us to advise or desire to blot out the distinctions of the different forms of rationalistic development at present existing. This would be to do away with rationalism itself. It would be discarding what is its chief glory, its superlative excellence.

The infusion of such a spirit into rationalism as we have indicated would not militate in any degree against the freedom or diversity of its development. It would induce only greater reciprocity of ideas and sympathies among its different divisions and representatives. Instead of the detached and isolated forces of an army fighting as it were at random, it would become consolidated and organized into a mighty power capable of hurling itself against the strongest points of the foe with damaging effect, and moving ever forward to victory under the animation of one uniting principle and spirit.

The old systems, against which we are contending, yet so ineffectually and feebly in comparison to what we should, understand this. They see in what our weakness lies. They see that we are distracted and divided. They remember the adage, "Divide and conquer." They contemplate us in view of this aspect of our condition with taunt and derision, and declare rationalism incapable of unity and coherence. Nor can it be otherwise until rationalism can understand itself better, and rise up to the height of a more genial and generous spirit, a grander and more comprehensive vision. At present, one of its most distinctive tendencies is to shut itself into isms (more or less exclusive) of one sort or another. It is Spiritualism, Materialism, Positivism, Socialism, and others innumerable. Now why should there not be some grand inclusive system of confraternity, in which all these bodies, in substantial accord, as they are, in the main great principles of rationalism (renouncing, as they all are, the old modes of life and thought, with eyes looking forward to the new order of the future), might find fellowship, strength, and consistent action?

What is it that hinders a consummation so devoutly to be wished? Is it not in too large a degree the same spirit of narrowness and intolerance which exists in the churches and against which radicals have so relentlessly and justly poured forth their assaults? Is it the assumption of rationalism that it is more reasonable than the churches; yet who more unreasonable than some radicals? Who more brain-cracked, wild, and impractical? Who have consumed their energies in more profitless pursuits? Who have been more misled into foolish, and worse than foolish, theories and courses of action?

Is there not a tendency too often, even among its most intelligent and earnest representatives, to give their chief attention and thought to mere quibbling and petty criticism,—the mere anise and cumlin, if we may use a Scripture simile,—and to neglect the more important considerations and appeals of the great movement with which they are identified? Indeed, so intense and chronic is this propensity that such persons seem to display, not unfrequently, greater pleasure in thus antagonizing the noblest workers and leaders of humanity, through insignificant and puerile exceptions to their positions or total misapprehension of them, than in giving them sympathy and cheer in the directions toward which they are aiming. What is the corrective? In what is the hope of eventual triumph for the cause of rationalism over embarrassments and obstructions like these?—in what but in a more general diffusion of intelligence among radicals, of broader thinking; the development of an increased and increasing spirit of reciprocity and coöperation; the acquisition of stronger and even truer leaders; the subjection of it always and everywhere, irrespective of whatever its form or name may be, to the severest tests of science and absolute reason?

AMERICAN LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

This is an age of conventions. There is no sign more obviously indicative of its intense mental activity than the number and variety of them. Indeed, they have become regarded as the almost indispensable concomitants of every cause that aims to arrest public attention and secure in a large degree its interest. When we consider, therefore, the importance of books and reading, their intimate, incalculable, and all-pervading influence, their relation to the highest culture and experience of human nature; when we consider also the stupendous magnitude to which libraries, the depositories of these resources, have grown, and especially some of them, and the responsibility of those whose business it is to superintend them,—it is not strange that there should have been felt the need of just such a gathering as that witnessed in this city last week.

The convention of the American Library Association, however, possessed a claim upon public interest apart from its intellectual character and professional and technical objects. It was not for the purpose simply of considering the care of libraries, and securing coöperation and counsel among librarians, the benefits of their respective experience, immensely important even as these would have been alone; but it embraced more popular aims. Its sessions were held at different educational institutions of the city, thus enabling those in attendance to visit these places of interest in the regular course of the meetings. The occasion was one of great importance in respect to books and reading in all their practical bearings. How to make libraries most valuable to the general public, what were the best books for children's reading, and the estimate to be placed upon works of fiction, and various correlative subjects were discussed with rare ability. It was one of the things which Boston enjoys and believes in; that is sure to enlist the sympathies of the most cultured and intellectual of its citizens: and when that is the case, there is little doubt about the character or success of the occasion, whatever it may chance to be.

THE GARRISON MEMORIAL.

The subscription fund for the memorial to William Lloyd Garrison in the city of Boston appears to be progressing favorably. Mr. Kidder, the committee's treasurer, reported at the end of the first week nearly two thousand dollars subscribed. This was in response to the newspaper advertisements and without the aid of any soliciting agents. It was a great relief to many of the warm believers in the grand beneficence of Garrison's career to find that this movement was on foot. It was beginning to seem as if Boston were going to let her great philanthropist pass away without any adequate recognition of his worth. The inquiry was anxiously put, Will not the city summon a public meeting to his memory, as in the case of those who have done her distinguished honor and service? For though Garrison never held public office, he was more than a statesman. But meantime this movement for "some form of memorial" has been organized and has evident strength. That it will succeed, there can be no doubt. A public meeting may be fitly held by and by in connection with it, though I am not aware that there is any such intention. But it would certainly be a good thing thus to declare and emphasize the meaning of the memorial to the younger generation of Boston.

What form the memorial shall take is not indicated, and probably is not yet determined. It is a problem, of course, the solution of which will depend in a large measure on the amount of the funds subscribed. And yet it is a problem that may be profitably discussed, especially by those to whose hearts and judgments Mr. Garrison's honor is very dear. This latter class of persons, those who believed in Garrison for the special direction and quality of his work as well as for the heroic elements of his character, will at first most naturally think of some form of memorial which shall continue the special philanthropic service of his life; some endowment, for instance, in a college, or some kind of institution by itself, designed for the education and progress of members of the race which his labors so largely contributed to setting free. Thus his very life-purpose and work would be perpetuated in his friends' memorial of him, to the lasting benefit of those wronged children of humanity for whom he lived. And this would seem, therefore, the kind of memorial that would best harmonize with his own wishes, and almost the only form that his spirit, so severely averse to everything that savored of mere ceremony and outward honor, could tolerate. Not a few of those who labored with him in the anti-slavery struggle would shrink, indeed, from the thought of anything like a mere statue of the man, such as is erected to scores of public men of one kind or another every year, as an adequate memorial to William Lloyd Garrison. It is so easy to get a marble monument or a statue in bronze, and Garrison's was so rare a character, and service like his comes so seldom in a century!

But, on the other hand, it is to be considered that anything like an adequate memorial of him in a beneficiary institution would require a colossal sum of money, such as is never raised simply for honoring a fellow-citizen, but only when other motives are also made a basis of appeal. The men to whose memory institutions are erected are generally those who have spent their lives in amassing immense fortunes, and at death, having no further use for their acquisitions, then bequeath them thus to perpetuate their own names. Garrison's name will be perpetuated without any monument. History will take care of that. What is wanted is some kind of memorial that will perpetuate the moral of his life as an incentive to virtue in coming generations. And to do this does not require the wealth of a Peabody or of a Johns Hopkins. Even to establish a beneficiary fund for the exclusive aid of colored students in Harvard University, or to endow a professorship in Garrison's name in the Hampton Normal Institute for colored students, near Fortress Monroe, which might be fitting things to do, would require a very large sum of money properly to meet the requirement; and even then the special object sought would not be kept in coming years conspicuously before the public eye, but would be gradually lost to public knowledge in the general interests of those institutions.

What, then, should be the form of the Boston memorial to Garrison? That it should not be a simple statue to the man in marble or bronze, morally majestic as the figure might be made, will, I think, for the reason above suggested or some other, be ultimately decided. It will, I think, be equally decided that it must take the form of a work of art, so as to keep the one desired object distinct and single before the public mind. And what will be required in a work of art will be not only the story of Garrison's moral and mental character, but the story of his life-service; that is, a large historical painting or a group of sculptures. Much might be said in favor of a picture, in the hands of the right artist (and Boston, of course, would not fall here), because especially of the greater freedom and larger scope permissible in the grouping. But a picture, though in a public room, is not easily and always accessible to the public eye. On this account a group of statuary is much better. And let it stand on Boston Common or in the Public Garden, where the people congregate and traverse to and fro, and where, on all days and in all weathers, it will tell to all beholders the story of Garrison's forty years' moral leadership in the anti-slavery conflict of this country.

Nor let it be objected that the city is to have, through the munificence of Mr. Kimball, a cast of the fine emancipation-group that stands in Lincoln Square, Washington. For the grouping need not follow the design of that work, to tell another phase of the story; and besides, if Boston is to have that group which perpetuates Abraham Lincoln's part in the act of emancipation, all the more should it erect another to the moral heroism of Garrison, who created the public sentiment that made Abraham Lincoln and the Proclamation of Emancipation possible.

MRS. MARY A. LIVERMORE addressed the Parker Memorial Society of this city, Sunday, June 29.

MR. W. S. BELL, the radical lecturer, is in the West. He was to speak at St. John, Ill., July 6.

MRS. FAWCETT, the wife of Professor Fawcett, is lecturing at Oxford, Eng., once a week, to ladies, on political economy.

MR. LONGFELLOW is reputed the best oral linguist in the country, speaking most of the modern languages with fluency.

MR. F. H. HINCKLEY, of the Free Religious Society, Providence, R.I., is filling an engagement for three Sundays at Florence, Mass.

MISS TAYLOR, daughter of Bayard Taylor, has translated a play in Germany which is being represented with success in that country.

THE PAINFUL intelligence reaches us, just as we go to press, that Mr. O. B. Frothingham, now in Paris, is thought, by his medical advisers there, to be in danger of paralysis.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON was elected an honorary member of the International Congress of authors that met in London a few days since. M. D. Conway was present as a looker-on, but Victor Hugo, who presided last year, did not come nor send the reason why.

MRS. JOSEPHINE BUTLER, who has been active in endeavoring to effect, in England, a repeal of the act for the legal regulation of vice, in which agitation Mr. Garrison took a hearty interest, writes that the intelligence of his death was received there with profound sadness.

REV. J. S. THOMSON, who was for a year or two settled over the Free Religious Society of New Milford, Pa., and has been more recently the preacher of the Free Congregational church of Bloomington, Ill., has dissolved his connection with the latter. Mr. Thomson has interests in England, his native country, which require his presence there, whither he sailed with his wife on Thursday last.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD met with some difficulty recently in lecturing at Pittsburgh, Pa. An attempt was made by some intolerant persons of the city to prevent him, to whom the mayor lent his influence. Nevertheless Mr. Underwood's friends secured him a hearing. One of the city papers said: "The discourse was an elegant and masterly presentation of the subject of materialism, and what it teaches in opposition to the doctrines of Christianity."

THE VENERABLE wife of a celebrated physician, one day, casting her eyes out of the window, observed her husband in the funeral procession of one of his patients, at which she exclaimed: "I do wish my husband would keep away from such processions. It appears so much like a tailor carrying home his work!"

DOTING MOTHER: "Yes, I shall be happy to give you the wages you ask, but I shall expect you to love the dear children." NURSE: "I shall be very happy to do so, ma'am; but of course that would be an extra."

narrative is traced by the author of the book of Origins.* Accepting the natural explanation that the older versions had been modified to a greater extent, as would be inevitable if handed down from an earlier period in unwritten tradition, while the later accounts would naturally follow more closely the Chaldean version, owing to the immediate and intimate contact of the two peoples during the captivity, these facts are seen to substantiate perfectly the positions of Kuenen and the Dutch school of Biblical critics as to the age of the different Pentateuch documents.

Moreover, we are told by Jewish writers in the Babylonian Talmud that the Jews called their written characters Assyrian, and that they were brought with them from Assyria.† This fact lends additional evidence to the intimate relationship of Assyria with the early Bible literature. Bowls and cups of terra cotta were discovered in Babylonia by Mr. Layard, containing inscriptions in Hebrew, written in a character resembling the Syriac and Palmyrene, some of which answer precisely to the description of the most ancient Hebrew letters in the Babylonian Talmud. "These," says Mr. Layard, "must have been written long prior to any ancient Hebrew or Chaldean manuscript now in existence."‡

We know that from the ninth century B.C. until after the captivity, the relations of the Hebrews and Assyrians were most intimate. During the greater part of this time, until the destruction of Nineveh, the Hebrews were tributary to the Assyrians, and must have learned something of their literature and legendary lore. It is probable that the earlier Genesis stories were transferred during this period, while those embodied in the book of Origins, the later Levitical redaction of the Law, came from the closer contact of the Babylonian captivity.§

We can accept no other conclusion, therefore, than this: That the cosmogony and early legends of the Bible originated in Babylonia or Chaldea, and were borrowed thence and through Assyria by the Hebrew writers. The Chaldean god Bel or Elu, called "the father of all the gods," is identical with El, the early deity of the Hebrews. In the inscriptions he is sometimes called Bel Sadi; literally, "a mountain," or "a rock," which corresponds with the Hebrew El Shaddai, a name indicative of strength and might.

The desert of Sin and Mount Sinai, renowned in the story of the wilderness wanderings of Moses and his people, derive their names from Sin, the moon-god of Chaldean mythology. Tubal-cain, named in Genesis as the first worker in metals, is identical with the Chaldean Bil kan and the Greek Vulcan, the god of metals, fire, and smiths. The word "cherub," used in the later writings of the Old Testament, is not of Hebrew but of Aryan origin, and entered the Hebrew literature through Babylonia.

As the Isdubar legends are traceable to a solar myth, so also the creation legend probably grew out of a mythical representation of the dawn of day, when the darkness of night yields before the morning twilight, making everything gradually distinguishable, while the animals first make themselves heard and seen, until at last man comes forth to pursue his labors.¶ The precedence given to the moon over the sun in the Chaldean version thus marks it as the earlier and purer form of this legend of the dawn.

In the story of Cain and Abel we have still another legend, the purpose being simply to describe that period in social evolution when the shepherd-nomad was compelled to give way before the husbandman, the representative of a higher civilization. The Hebrews, having hardly emerged from the nomadic condition, represented this social era as a tragedy and the conquering husbandman as the first murderer. The word Cain means "gained," indicating the successful result of his competition, while the word Abel means "evanescence," thus fitly describing the instability of a nomad population.

It is well known that as the early races of mankind outgrew the lower forms of ancestor-worship and fetishism, the first objects of wonder and worship were the broad expanses of the heavens, the sun, the moon, and the stars. Imagination traced in the midnight skies the figures of the constellations, peopling the visible heavens with gods and goddesses, translated heroes, and the forms of various animals. To account for them, and for the movements of the heavenly bodies, the alternation of day and night and the changes of the seasons, these legends gradually grew into being. An uncultured people like the early Hebrews, coming in contact with the higher civilization of Chaldea and Assyria, hearing these stories, but only imperfectly comprehending their meaning, transferred them, variously distorted by alteration, into their sacred literature. That they should do this, is neither blameworthy nor unnatural; but how pitiful is that prostitution of intellect and reason which requires Christendom to-day to accept these legends as the facts of history and science!

Very beautiful are some of these old stories with their whisperings of truth, when we are permitted fearlessly to interrogate them and to appropriate their real meanings. Because the Hebrew writers dressed up their early religion in these second-hand legends of the Pentateuch, we should not therefore hasten wholly to condemn them. These stories were the inheritance of Abraham as well as of the Baby-

Ionians; the Jews had as much right to appropriate them as the Assyrians.

Should we not be thankful that the old notion that God once had a "chosen people," to whom he made a special and exclusive revelation while all the rest of the world was left in darkness, is no longer tenable? Every advance in science and critical scholarship and civilization helps to demonstrate the truth that no part of the universe has ever been neglected by the ever-working Power that makes for beauty and order and righteousness; whose constant method of evolution is revealed alike in the development of a world out of the primitive fire-mist and in the growth of the literature, religion, and civilization of a people. The Bible will be more interesting and more useful, and not less, when it is seen clearly that it is a purely human literary product, the natural revelation, in common with the loftier literature of all the world, of God in man, rather than the supernatural revelation of God to man.

We may not, therefore, worship it as a fetish, or regard it with superstitious veneration; but study it rather, because it is purely natural and human; because many streams of life have converged to swell its tide of religious progress and development; because Chaldean, Egyptian, Persian, and Greek have all contributed to form its literature. So doing, we shall read between the lines a larger charity, a broader conception of the brotherhood of man, than it is possible to derive from the past interpretations of an exclusive supernaturalism.

Reading in this spirit, in the sunlight of reason and critical investigation are dissipated not only the waters of a mythical deluge,* but also those darker waters of superstition which have their fountain in the current interpretation of the Bible stories of the fall of man and the total depravity of human nature. Traced alike to their source in these ancient Chaldean myths, it is a monstrous anomaly of unreason that they should longer rest like an incubus upon the religion, the hopes, and the aspirations of mankind.

Nor is it possible that in discovering the genesis and determining the character of these ancient myths, we should destroy anything that is really good or helpful in the Bible writings. Truth only is saving; falsehood—error—is always destructive, both to the intellectual and to the moral nature of man. Seeking the truth, therefore, in all sincerity, and without preconceptions, we cannot err if we "test all things thoroughly, and hold fast to that which is good."

BOSTON CO-OPERATIVE STORE.

The first annual meeting of the shareholders of the Boston Co-operative Store was held in Stacy Hall last evening, June 19. The Hon. Josiah Quincy, who presided, made a short address. He congratulated the gentlemen on the position of the enterprise. The capital stock had been all paid in and the store opened. The number of customers who were not members had far exceeded the expectation of the managers, and it only needed that the members should patronize their own store to render success certain. After explaining the system on which the store is run, Mr. Quincy said: The members of your association now represent five hundred, and will soon, probably, one thousand families. The united custom of these would be a great object to dealers. By dealing through the store, the purchaser can thus secure a commission. For instance, a milk dealer, to obtain the custom of such a store, will sell milk at the usual price of six cents, and agree, on presenting his bill at the store for payment, to receive but five, thus in fact giving the customer, through the store, a reduction of a cent a quart. A similar arrangement can be made with dealers in coal, provisions, boots and shoes, clothing, and, in fact, with retail dealers in all branches. After speaking of the benefits of co-operation, he said: How can its advantages be most effectively extended? The Legislature at the last session authorized such associations to hold a capital of $100,000. To enable the very poorest to avail themselves of its benefits it is proposed to adopt the English custom to allow any one, on depositing a small sum, say twenty-five or fifty cents, to have the full dividends on his purchases, which are carried to his credit, but not paid until they amount to $4, when a share is issued. The Boston co-operative store is now in a position that enables it either to assist other stores, by acting as a purchaser for them, or by establishing branches. To establish a branch store it would be necessary that four or five hundred shares, at $4 each, should be taken by a sufficient number of persons to insure a reasonable amount of custom. When established, the new shareholders would have the same profits as the old. Charitably disposed persons can benefit the industrial classes, while benefiting themselves, by purchasing at these stores. Every purchase increases the profits, for the larger amount of goods sold the less per cent. of expense to the buyer, and the greater the per cent. of the dividends. The managers of factories in our large manufacturing towns, by aiding and encouraging the formation of such stores, will in a considerable degree compensate for the reduction of wages they have been compelled to make, by reducing the cost of the necessities of life. Your organization has already produced much good. Applications for your by-laws have been received from all parts of the United States. Probably more than fifty stores have been, or soon will be, opened in consequence of your example, and this most comprehensive scheme of benevolence, resting on self-help and material assistance, become general throughout the land.—Boston Advertiser, June 20.

*The story as illustrative of solar mythology may have gathered around, and intermingled with, the tradition of some local "Mill River" disaster in the Euphrates valley. The probability is, however, that there are absolutely no historical elements traceable in it.

THE CHURCH AND EDUCATION IN FRANCE.

Mr. Theodore Stanton, son of Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, in an essay on Education in France, read before the alumni of Cornell University during the recent Commencement week at Ithaca, speaks as follows of the influence of the Church on the public schools of France:—

"Perhaps the greatest lesson taught us of the United States by a study of the educational system of France is the ineffable danger to sound education arising from the union of church and school, from the intrusion of sectarianism on the public schools.

"Let us see what footing the Church—and more especially the Catholic Church—has in the State schools of France. A leading educator of France, speaking of Guizot's law of 1833, which laid the foundation of the French primary-school system, says: 'The first object of primary instruction is moral and religious. In virtue of this opinion, accepted by all subsequent laws and faithfully observed under every régime, religion, in France, has always formed a part of the instruction in the primary schools.' The Academic Council of the Academy of Paris, in recommending, during the empire, a list of books to the teachers of the department, for use in the primary schools, gives the titles of not less than eighteen books on religious subjects, most of them lives of Christ, and one of them from the pen of that bigoted fagelman of Rome, the late Bishop Dupanloup. In the list of historical works, ten are on sacred history, and one of them is written by Cardinal de Bonnechose. In the Superior Council for 1878—the great State board of education—I find the names of two Catholic cardinals, two Catholic bishops, and two minor Catholic prelates, two Protestant ministers and a Jewish rabbi. In the Academic Councils—and there is one for each of the seventeen academies—are three or four Catholic dignitaries and often a Protestant minister and a Jewish rabbi. The Departmental Councils—and there is one for each of the ninety departments—have about the same number of ecclesiastical members. In the primary schools, a figure of the crucified Christ is always before the eyes of the children, and the catechism and sacred history are among the regular studies. In the lycées the students are also drilled on sacred history, generally written in Latin.

"Thus we see what a hold the Church, and especially the Romish Church, has on the State system of France. Yet from the very beginning, the Church has used its power, not to build up the State schools, but to pull them down. It has been a virus which has ever threatened the system with death, a dangerous foe within the camp, a sworn enemy of sound education, a secret plotter against the University of France. Even since the State, listening to the plausible arguments of the Catholics against its monopoly of instruction, has yielded to their demands and recognized the principle of liberty in teaching,—the Church still pronounces the State schools the curse of France, and goes to work to build up a system of its own, with the secret hope of eventually undermining the State system.

"And now the liberals, the republicans of France, perceiving too late the primal error of ever admitting the Church into the State system, are endeavoring to root it out and to make the State schools entirely free of all Church influence. This is the aim of M. Jules Ferry's educational bill, now before the Chamber of Deputies, which the Catholics of France, with the Bishop of Aix at their head, are to-day fighting tooth and nail.

"What a lesson should this be to America never to suffer any religious denomination to intrench itself within the portals of our public schools, and how it should strengthen the hearts of us of Cornell to battle on more vigorously than ever before, to drive out from our universities, where it has too long held sway, this same deadly foe of a broad and honest education."

THE "CONSENSUS OF THE COMPETENT."

EDITOR INDEX:—

I cannot discern any ultimate or practical difference between an "Individualist" and a "Consensus-of-the-Competent"—ist. I cannot see how any one seeking to do right, no matter what he calls himself or what others call him, can avoid in any case judging for himself; nor yet how he can at the same time avoid trying to act according to the "Consensus of the Competent." To say that an "Individualist" is endeavoring to do right when he is doing that which he knows is disapproved by the judgment of those whose competence of judging he recognizes obviously involves an absurdity. On the other hand, could Mr. Abbot himself do what his own judgment and conscience disapproved, and yet claim that he had done right? For suppose he interposed the plea that he had acted in obedience to the "Consensus of the Competent," what would he answer when asked why, of all others, he took those to be the "competent" whose "consensus" opposed his judgment and outraged his conscience?

No one who desires "his own private judgment" to be trustworthy will fail of making the general judgment of the wisest, so far as he can, a factor in its formation and criterion of its correctness; at the same time, the person who aims to have his conduct conform in any degree to the "Consensus of the Competent" will, in every instance, have to exercise and depend upon "his own private judgment" for determining who are the "competent" and what is their "consensus,"—the very questions in every case that cause all the difficulty.

I am further than Mr. Abbot himself, perhaps, from being an "Individualist," if to be one is to ignore or undervalue public sentiment. For I not only hold (as I understand him to do) that ascertained public sentiment is the highest test in morals, but I hold (as I don't exactly understand him to do) that public sentiment makes all the morality there is. Nevertheless, as I also believe that one's primary and ultimate reliance must be upon his own private judgment (and that nothing can ever take precedence of it), it is allowable, perhaps, for me to reply to the ad rem question Mr. Abbot so pointedly puts to "any Individualist," viz.: "Did not Freeman, on your own principle, have an undoubted right to murder his child in obedience to his own private judgment in morals?"

As "murder" is always the wrongful killing of a human being, Mr. Abbot's question is such a one that an answer thereto, if as categorical as the question itself, is bound to be in the negative or else constitute the absurdity there is in affirming that Freeman rightfully did wrong. Assuming, however, that Mr. Abbot's using the word "murder" rather than "kill" was a mere inadvertence (which my perfect confidence in his fairness warrants me in assuming),—my answer to his question is that Freeman's right only extended to the free exercise of "his own private judgment," and that, like the rest of us in every matter, he had to exercise it at his own private peril. Which peril, not the guilt of the horrible error he fell into, was no greater than it would have been had he been doing his best to be guided by the "Consensus of the Competent"; supposing, indeed, as Mr. Abbot strangely does, that he really was not guided by it.

By the way, Mr. Abbot's answer to Mr. Wright's clear showing that Freeman did act in obedience to what he took (or mistook) to be the "Consensus of the Competent" was not, it seems to me, precisely point-blank with the target (and this was one of the cases wherein "a miss is as good as a mile").

He cited the assertion of Freeman himself, that the latter acted in killing his child upon his "conscientious convictions." But I submit that Freeman will have to declare that his "conscientious convictions" in the case were not in unison with and produced by the "Consensus" (contained in his Bible and proclaimed in his church) of those (to wit, the writers of the Bible legends and his guides ecclesiastical) whom he recognized to be the "Competent," before his testimony can help the case Mr. Abbot is trying to sustain.

The only grievance, however, as respects the "Freeman case" that Mr. Abbot takes any account of (judging from the burden both of his question and his replication to Mr. Wright's answer thereto) is not that Freeman killed his own child, but it is that in doing so he acted (as Mr. Abbot supposes) "in obedience to his own private judgment in morals." If he had acted "in obedience to" something or other else, he might have "had an undoubted right to murder [slay] his own child"—seems to be implied; though, as such implication would harmonize imperfectly with dicta in other of Mr. Abbot's writings, it would be highly interesting to know what his dicta is upon such a supposition,—whether he would maintain that there was no right anywhere either in case or posse that could, in any contingency, have accrued to Freeman over the life of his innocent child, or whether he admits that if public sentiment and law had been similar in Massachusetts to what they were in ancient Rome, Sparta, and some other communities, Freeman might have had such right.

And if Mr. Abbot or any one, whether an "Individualist" or a "Consensus-of-the-Competent"—ist, will maintain that Freeman's killing of his child was immoral for any other reason than that it is execrated by society (just as it is criminal because condemned by the State), and will assert that public sentiment, not the statutes of Massachusetts or of ancient Rome or Laconia, or of any other community, had not nor ever have had anything to do with the inherent and ultimate right and wrong of a man's destroying his offspring; and that there is something above evanescent public sentiment and changeable human laws to be appealed to in such case,—I beg that he in the first place will point out what and where that something is; in the second place, show that that something was not precisely what Freeman did appeal to; and thirdly, show that Freeman did not receive therefrom an assurance as real as he himself is confident of, that he not only had an undoubted right, but that it was his bounden duty, to kill his own innocent, loving, and dearly beloved child! Truly yours, S. J. MATTHEWS.

MONTICELLO, Ark., June 21, 1879.

YOU CAN JUDGE of his condition by the following: "I shay, my frien," can you tell me where the other side of the street is?" "Certainly. Just across the way. Why do you ask?" "Why, because a minute ago I asked another feller the same thing, and (hic) he said this was the other side of the street."

"HOW MANY BODS make a furlong?" asked a father of his son, a fast urchin, as he came home from school. "Well, I don't know," was the reply of young hopeful; "but I fancy you'd think one rod made an acher if you got such a tanning as I did from old Scroggins this afternoon."

AN AGENT who had sold a Dutchman some goods was to deliver them at the residence of the purchaser. The Dutchman gave him the following directions: "You shoost goes behind de church; den you turns up de right for awhile till you come to a house with a big hog in the yard. Dot's me."

FETISH WORSHIP.

BY THEODORE HOFFERICHTER.

[Translated from the German by HELEN T. CLARK.]

Fetichism has been developed chiefly from the simple worship of Nature. The word "fetich" is Portuguese ("feticão"), and signifies "a magic log or tree-trunk." "Feticão" is derived from the Portuguese "feticaria," or "the power of magic." A large proportion of the African and Indian tribes are to-day given to fetich-worship.

The principal distinction between simple Nature-worship and fetichism lies in the fact that in the former the natural object is recognized involuntarily as the superior power, in the latter the recognition is voluntary. Each chooses his own fetich, while in simple Nature-worship the natural object compels mankind by its own manifest power.

Fetichism is the first step towards a mythology. With it begins the endowment of natural objects with human attributes and personalities. Man makes his gods in his own image whenever he ascribes to natural objects human thoughts, sensations, desires, and actions, and finally the human form itself, and ways of life.

This deifying of natural objects is fetichism. The fetich-worshiper presupposes in the fetich he has chosen the power of warding evil from him, and of bestowing fortune or happiness; in other words, he attributes to the object a sympathetic feeling such as he has for his fellow-beings. He invents for it a disposition like that found in man, but ascribes to it the power of manifesting this sympathy in a marvellous degree and manner.

Fetichism is the first presentiment of the higher significance of the human soul, which is capable of making Nature subservient to itself, of turning the forces of Nature to its own account. Moreover, because it is the first dim presentiment,—not an intelligent recognition, not a rational knowledge,—men lose themselves in a by-path which has been portentous of the future unfolding of the whole religious life of humanity; for this once-trod way is not again abandoned, but farther pursued, and leads continually deeper into error.

The feeling dawns in man that he must bring himself into determinate relation with Nature, upon whom he feels so dependent; that Nature should not be so aloof from him as in the simple form of Nature-worship, but must be made servicable to him.

He is not yet conscious, however, that it is his privilege to bend her powers to his needs and aims; so he transfers his own capabilities to some one special object which he finds occasion to admire, and out of this object he creates his idol.

In fetichism, Nature ceases to be mere Nature; she takes on a foreign quality, and becomes also spirit—spirit as it is peculiar to man.

To the fetich-worshiper, moreover, the entire realm of Nature seems august, powerful, and venerable. If he yet selects therefrom single objects to which he offers his worship, we there recognize the earliest stirrings of the freedom of the human soul. Man takes upon himself the right to determine, through his own choice and recognition, what shall be the object of his veneration. Through his choosing, however, another need of the religious feeling finds satisfaction. In simple Nature-worship man is still swayed by the fear of natural power, but the religious feeling makes its presence known by a trustfulness, a leaning towards the superior power, a striving to draw near to it in a tender relation.

The fetich-worshiper takes his chosen fetich into his house or hut, and holds the most confidential intercourse with it. He talks and complains to it, imparts to it his desires, sets food and drink before it to win its favor, thanks it when he believes it has helped him, washes and decorates it, and even lets the intimacy go so far as to abuse and cudgel his idol, and at last casts it out of his hut when he considers that it has failed to perform its obligations to him. In place of the rejected fetich another is immediately chosen. The savage behaves to his fetich wholly according to his own will and caprice. A momentary fancy, a dream, an accident, determines his choice.

A Caffre, in breaking a piece from the anchor of a stranded vessel, lost his life. The inhabitants of the place afterwards ascribed to the anchor a superior power, and greeted it obsequiously in passing, in order to avert its anger from themselves. Stones, logs, stakes, stumps, skins of beasts, skulls and other bones, such as horns, teeth, feathers, and other parts of animals, are in common use as fetiches. But not only the parts of dead animals, but also living animals and plants and even stars, are thus honored. A tribe on the island of Sumatra choose their fetiches thus: each one selects the object upon which his glance first falls on waking in the morning, so that each day he might have a new protecting spirit. Many Africans provide a collection of fetiches. An African traveller found in one hut more than twenty thousand. Sometimes the savage marks his fetich by an outward sign to distinguish it from things profane. He ornaments it with feathers, egg-shells, entrails, rags, etc. The attempt is frequently made to give the fetich the human semblance, when they either paint stones or logs with eyes, nose, and mouth, or, in a clumsy fashion, carve a human figure out of a stick of wood. We have then the strict "idol-figure" (Greek "eidolon"; German "Bild").

Where fetichism prevails, still further, each individual has not only his special fetich, but every community, district, and family. The community-fetich has to do only with general concerns, the family-fetich only with family affairs. Community-fetiches are sometimes exchanged, though more rarely than family ones. Wars are even entered upon in order to seize a more potent fetich from a neighboring district. Family-fetiches are mostly kept concealed in the forest, accessible only to the priest, who makes known their commands. It is not even allowable for their names to be spoken. Traces of fetich-worship have been retained in more developed forms of religion. The robbery which "Rahel" committed upon the idols of his fathers that he might not suffer from their curses, the "Ark of the Covenant" which the Israelites carried with them into battle, the stone which Jacob raised up at Bethel in memory of his dream, like the holy black stone in the Kaaba, the chief temple at Mecca, and many others, savor of fetichism. Even to-day in the midst of cultivated peoples, fetiches and idols are worshipped.—Milwaukee "Freidenker."

EVILS OF COMPETITION.

Competition is the best security for cheapness, but by no means a security for quality. In former times, when producers and consumers were less numerous, it was a security for both. The market was not large enough nor the means of publicity sufficient to enable a dealer to make a fortune by continually attracting new customers: his success depended on his retaining those he had; and when a dealer furnished good articles or when he did not, the fact was soon known to those whom it concerned, and he acquired a character for honest or dishonest dealing of more importance to him than the gain that would be made by cheating casual purchasers. But on the great scale of modern transactions, with the great multiplication of competition and the immense increase in the quantity of business competed for, dealers are so little dependent on permanent customers that character is much less essential to them, while there is also far less certainty of their obtaining the character they deserve. The low prices which a tradesman advertises are known to a thousand for one who has discovered for himself, or learned from others, that the bad quality of the goods is more than an equivalent for their cheapness; while at the same time the much greater fortunes now made by some dealers excite the cupidity of all, and the greed of rapid gain substitutes itself for the modest desire to make a living by their business. In this manner, as wealth increases and greater prizes seem to be within reach, more and more of a gambling spirit is introduced into commerce; and when this prevails not only are the simplest maxims of produce disregarded, but all, even the most perilous, forms of pecuniary improbity receive a terrible stimulus. This is the meaning of what is called the intensity of modern competition. It is further to be mentioned that when this intensity has reached a certain height, and when a portion of the producers of an article or the dealers in it have resorted to any of the modes of fraud, such as adulteration, giving short measure, etc., of the increase of which there is now so much complaint, the temptation is immense on those to adopt the fraudulent practices who would not have originated them; for the public are aware of the low prices fallaciously produced by the frauds, but do not find out at first, if ever, that the article is not worth the lower price, and they will not go on paying a higher price for a better article, and the honest dealer is placed at a terrible disadvantage. Thus the frauds, begun by a few, become customs of the trade, and the morality of the trading classes is more and more deteriorated.—John Stuart Mill, "Chapters on Socialism."

JEWS IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

We clip the following good account of Jewish children: "A look upon the roll of pupils of the San Francisco public schools who have graduated with distinction from their respective classes at once places the Jewish children of this city in an enviable position. 'Jewish children,' says the Hebrew, 'figure prominently among the pupils who have received the highest percentage of credits while passing the examination, and thereby shown themselves possessed of exceptional talents and diligence. In many instances, the number of Jewish pupils who have graduated with distinction from our public schools is so large that it appears out of every proportion to the number of Jewish children attending these institutions, which, after all, is but very limited when compared with that of other denominations. On the list of seventy graduates from the South Cosmopolitan Grammar School, for example, which has been compiled by taking the five pupils from each class who have received the highest percentage, no less than fifty-four Jewish children are to be found, or more than seventy-five per cent. of the entire number. A like spectacle, or at least one very near to it, can be witnessed in quite a number of our public schools. This, certainly, tends to prove that the Jewish school-children of San Francisco keep up the reputation of learning and intelligence for which their race is noted.'"

THE SIMPLEST THING IN THE WORLD.—"That Venus," said a critic severely, "is a pretty poor piece of work." "It is very easy for you to say so," says a friend of the artist; "still a man has got to have some acquaintance with art before he can sculp a statue like that." "Oh, bosh, as Mr. Ruskin says. Sculpture, per se, is the simplest thing in the world. All you have to do is to take a big chunk of marble and a hammer and chisel, make up your mind what you are about to create and chip off all the marble you don't want."—Paris Gaulois.

A CLERGYMAN recently aroused his sleepy audience by asserting in the most positive manner that, notwithstanding the hard times, the wages of sin have not been cut down one iota.

FOREIGN.

A MONUMENT to Boccaccio was unveiled on the 22d ult. at Certaldo, Italy.

THE HOUSE at Newtown, Montgomeryshire, in which Robert Owen was born is advertised to be sold by public auction on Wednesday, July 2d. The house is a large and substantial one, and is situated in the principal street of the town.—National Reformer.

THE SABBATH ALLIANCE of Scotland are reported to have received several snubs while endeavoring to secure a more rigid observance of Sunday. Their appeal to the board of directors of the Caledonian Company was answered by the chairman as follows: "While respecting conscientious convictions, I cannot admit that the society you represent have any right to catechise me and my management of this railway, and you must excuse me for declining correspondence on the subject."

FROM NEW ZEALAND papers brought by the last mail we learn that Mr. Charles Bright, a talented and earnest freethought exponent, has been making a successful lecturing tour under the auspices of the Freethought Association of Dunedin. The reports of two addresses delivered by Mr. Bright in Marlborough show that he is in all respects qualified for the trust reposed in him. It is certain that Mr. Bright's calm logic and appeals to reason are doing much to banish superstition at the other end of the world, and we hope to hear further news of his success.—National Reformer.

E. J. REED, M.P., who has just returned from Japan, writes to the Times: "My visit to the country has convinced me that the Christian religion is not making the progress there which other European systems are making, and that there are reasons why its progress will continue to be very slow indeed for some time to come." But he adds that: "An indication of great impending religious changes in Japan is to be found in the fact that the temples are already the scenes of extremely free discussions between the priests and the people. A discussion which took place in August last at the temple of Shin-kai-zhi, at Shinagawa, Tokio, during a discourse by a priest on 'Infinite Vision,' furnished an illustration of this. Numerous members of the audience interrupted and cross-examined the preacher, one of them saying, 'All that the priesthood affirms on the subject of heaven and hell is a mere fabrication.'"

WHY, IN THE name of Fortune, do the clergy of the Church of England desire to interfere with Sunday amusements? The workingman, we mean the diligent tradesman who works in shop or manufactory honestly from Monday morning until Saturday night, takes off his harness at the end of the week, as an omnibus horse does, for rest and recreation. Is he to be groomed and wiped down simply to be driven into a place of worship which is irksome or depressing to him? Some of the see-saw and droning sermons now preached by young curates, who have no more heart in their work than machines, are really below the intelligence of the workingman. They might have done for the old round frock days of the wretched laborer, who could look up in the spirit of Goldsmith's villager, when he, listening, "gazed, and still the wonder grew, That one small head could carry all he knew." But we are growing thoughtful now. At the meeting of the Southsea Pier Company we find some expressions of dissent among the directors at the attempt made to stop the playing of the band on a Sunday. It was urged that the clergy had made this objection; but, happily, the directors, who are men of business and discernment, overruled the frivolous protest, and the band will play. We shall be glad when the time comes to open all healthy and moral places of amusement on Sundays.—West Sussex Gazette.

JESTINGS.

IT IS VERY dangerous to make up your judgment concerning a young lady's weight by measuring her sighs.

THE "LITTLE CHRISTIAN" calls kicking chairs and door-slammings "wooden swearing," and says it is just as bad as the real thing.

WHAT A FEELING of relief comes over a woman as she enters a church and discovers that her neighbor's wife has the same feather on her spring hat that she wore last season.—Marathon Independent.

LITTLE ANDY has got to the head of his class at last. "I hope you will stay there now," says his father. "Oh no, I don't think I will, pa," says the thoughtful boy; "I might get too proud."

PHILADELPHIA Chronicle-Herald: "No, darling," said the undertaker to his wife, "I can't afford to give you a silk dress at present. Just wait a few weeks till green apples are in the market."

A PARISHIONER of a Berkshire pastor was asked what the color of the pastor's eyes was. He didn't really know, "for," he said, "when he prays his eyes are shut, and when he preaches I generally shut mine."

LANDLADY: How shall I make out the bill for this article in the parlor, John? Shall I call him "Mr." or "Esquire"? Landlord: Oh, you may write him "Esquire," and charge him 'alf a sovereign extra.—London Punch.

TOM HOOD, the poet, was angling one day in Love Harbor and caught a cuttle-fish. Unaware that it was what would now be called by the frivolous an "ink-slinger," he "laid hold of it to unhook it, and received its full jet d'eau in his face." Being asked what he had on his line, he replied, "that he did not know exactly, but thought he had caught a young garden engine."

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1878, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

LIBERAL LEAGUE PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N.B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification for any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

SIFTINGS.

THE COLORED REFUGEES FUND of Boston reported collections a few days since, to the amount of $3,832.

"THE GOOD and noble man," said Epictetus, "does nothing for the sake of appearances, but everything for the sake of acting well."

IT IS WELL, no doubt, to try to keep on the sunny side of life, but some allowances should be made when the thermometer is at the nineties.

THERE IS a rumor that the pushing Frenchman, M. de Lesseps, proposes to make Gen. Grant the figure-head of his great canal enterprise.

CAMBRIDGE has what is called a whittling school for boys. We have known boys to excel in that accomplishment without any special instruction.

"WRITING-INK and printing-ink," says a German poet, "are the best weapons to use against the devil; they will in time chase him entirely from the world."

TO KNOW ONE person who is positively to be trusted, will do more for a man's moral nature—yes, for his spiritual nature—than all the sermons he has ever heard or ever can hear.—George MacDonald.

"THERE IS," says a German exchange, "something elevating in the solemn tone of the midnight bell. Especially if one is still ten blocks from home, where a loving wife is waiting behind the door with a slipper in her hand."

A SPIRITUALIST camp-meeting at Nesheaminy Falls Grove, near Philadelphia, from July 18 to August 13, will doubtless bring together a great many people. Many of the most distinguished Spiritualists of the country, it is expected, will be present.

THE OTTAWA Herald does not appear to have a very high appreciation of missions. This is the way it speaks of them: "The entire outlay of the Christians of the United States upon foreign missions does not exceed $2,000,000 annually, which is exactly two millions thrown away."

THE IRISH Presbyterian Church appears to be rather slow in acquiring modern ideas and ways. At its recent assembly at Belfast, it declined to compile a hymn-book for adoption in worship, by a vote of 225 to 157. It also reaffirmed its decision of 1873 against instrumental music, and directed its presbyteries to bring the law before offending congregations and report at the next assembly.

A SPIRITED MEETING to consider the colored exodus was held at the Music Hall in Lynn last week. The Hon. J. M. Buffum presided and said that "if the war had settled anything, it was that the unfortunate beings who had been slaves in the South should be free forever, and have the same rights and privileges which white men enjoy. But we learn they are deprived of these liberties." The meeting was addressed at length by Gen. Conway.

THE PUBLIC exercises of the Fourth of July in Boston this year were observed with a prayer by a Roman Catholic priest and the reading of the Declaration of Independence by a colored boy from one of the city schools. Now our city fathers are in the way of novelties in these matters, we would suggest that Mr. Seaver be invited next year to discourse on the relation of Thomas Paine to the American Revolution, or infidelity to republican liberty on this continent. Perhaps the Rev. Mr. Cook would consent to "invoke the divine blessing," and as to the rest of the programme,—well, that can be left to after-consideration.

A RATHER remarkable sign of the times was recently witnessed in Philadelphia. It was a union (Sunday evening) service of the "Shaare Emeth" Jewish congregation (Rabbi Sonnenschein) and that of the Second Baptist Church (Rev. W. W. Boyd) of that city. When we recall the outrage and insult which Jews have suffered from Christians, and still experience to no small extent from them, when we consider also how much money has been foolishly expended for the conversion of Jews to Christianity and is still spent for this purpose, there is reason to rejoice in such symptoms as the above of a growing common-sense and humanity.

EARTHQUAKES appear to have become unusually frequent of late in some parts of the world. At Aachen (Aix la Chapelle) several shocks were felt on May 26, soon after 8 P.M., which seemed to proceed from west to east. At Idstein (in the Prussian province of Nassau) a violent shock occurred on May 27, about one A.M. There was a severe one in Costa Rica on the night of May 29. The cathedral and many of the principal buildings of San Jose were shattered, and much damage was done in other parts of the republic. On the 7th inst. an earthquake of short duration was observed at Versailles at 10.55 P.M. A telegram from Messina, June 17th, stated that continued shocks of earthquake, attributed to the volcanic action of Mount Etna, had occurred in the neighborhood of Santa Venera and Guardia, causing serious damage and considerable loss of life. Vesuvius, it is stated, is showing signs of activity. Distinct shocks have been felt at different places in the Hebrides.

IT IS INTERESTING to observe how customs and manners change. This is as noticeable in matters of religion as in others. A striking illustration of this is witnessed in the popularity which camp-meetings are acquiring among the various sects. It is not many years since they were considered rather an indecorous and vulgar institution. The Methodists, up to that time, were about the only denomination who had made the practice one of their established usages. But one after another, of late years, the other denominations have begun to feel that such occasions were altogether too enjoyable and sensible to allow their Methodist brethren to have the exclusive monopoly of them. They have accordingly conquered their prejudices and gone in for these religious jollifications, until we hear of camp-meetings of nearly all the different orders. Even such unexceptionable and proper people as the Unitarians, we notice, have been unable to withstand the force of the current in this direction. Of course there must always be a certain amount of preaching and praying at such times. The preachers, poor fellows, are so accustomed to such things that they can't conceive of a programme of simple, natural, rustic enjoyment without them, and the people seem to consider themselves bound to submit to the infliction, though we conjecture they would often rather be plucking the wildflowers and checkerberry, clambering over the old logs, meditating by the side of the rippling streamlets, watching the squirrel, and listening to the bird-song. If there must be formal speaking on such occasions, let it not be of the professionally religious cast. Let preachers and people have rest, and both will be all the better for such exercises afterwards. If there must be public addresses, let them be by scientists or naturalists invited for the purpose. They could instruct and enlighten those present in regard to the wonders that are around them, of which most would know altogether too little, and would thus impart to the occasion a fresh intellectual zest in addition to the rejuvenating physical influences afforded. Then there might be singing, dialogues, and dramatic entertainments, and moonlight dances with all necessary arrangements essential to order and propriety. But apart from these comments and suggestions, we are gratified in noticing the tendency referred to. It is taking religion out of doors, and subjecting it to its vivifying and healthful influences. It is cultivating a closer sympathy and more intimate fellowship with Nature, whose teachings often surpass our wisest wisdom; even that of the cloisters and the schools.

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N. Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

William Lloyd Garrison.

A DISCOURSE DELIVERED IN THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, NEW BEDFORD, JUNE 8, AND IN PARKER MEMORIAL HALL, BOSTON, JUNE 22, 1879.

BY WILLIAM J. POTTER.

For nearly two generations the anti-slavery issue has presented the crucial test to American political and ecclesiastical virtue. From the time of the Missouri Compromise to the present day, that issue has shaped the politics of the country. It has been the corner-stone on which political parties have been built or on which they have been broken; it has directed legislation; it has inspired statesmen with noble ambitions or been the rock on which they have shipwrecked; it has brought the boasted theoretical freedom of the press and the platform to its trial hour; it has dominated or divided churches; it has arraigned the faith of church-members and carried their creeds before the judgment-bar of the civilized world. This question, indeed, for this period, has been the central and controlling issue in American history. It has created American history for fifty years.

The man who set that test—the man who, more than any other, threw that disturbing element into American politics and religion—has recently gone down to his grave. Regarded during the greater part of his career, by the politics and religion of his country, as only a pestilent and impracticable agitator, he has gone to his grave amidst the praises of politicians and the reverence of pulpits. Beginning his career as an obscure printer, with no aids from family or wealth or social position, with the enormous odds of all the forces of Church and State and social fashion against him, he compelled the country to hear his plea for justice to the slave, and became one of the chief factors in American public life. Never himself mingling in political affairs, his hand was felt at the central wheel of the political machinery of the country. Not a politician, he has made and unmade political leaders. Never holding nor seeking public office, he has put men into office and withdrawn them from it. Abstaining by principle from voting even, there was no man in the nation whose ballot was more evident as a public power in Congress and the White House. Not daring to risk his life in any Southern State, no Northern man was so feared in the South as he. Beginning his life-work when not a church would admit his word, he has revolutionized the churches of all the Northern States. By profession and practice a peace man, even a non-resistant, the issue he presented culminated in one of the most gigantic civil wars that the world has known. Denouncing the federal Constitution and the Union founded upon it as a wicked compact to be dissolved and destroyed, he created the public sentiment that purged the Constitution of the evil element and reformed the Union when broken. Opening the conflict single-handed, without money, in a garret,—as the conflict proceeded, imprisoned, mobbed, derided and despised by the respectability and wealth of society, dragged through the streets by an infuriated crowd of his fellow-citizens, a bribe offered by a Southern legislature to assassinate for his head,—he lived to see the intellect and conscience of the country converted to his principle, and has gone to his grave respected and honored by the great majority of his countrymen and crowned with a world-wide fame. Entering the contest when there were two millions of slaves in the country, increased to four and a half millions before the task was finished, he has died and left not a bondman in the land.

Here are the elements of a career of exceptional greatness,—of exceptional greatness whether we consider it in the grandeur of its aim, in the single-eyed heroism of its activities, or in the marvellous triumph of its results; and a career so dramatically knit together in all its parts by the thread of one consistent principle as to stand forth in unique and superb relief in our country's annals. When the national history of the era just closing shall be written,—the heroic era of the American anti-slavery struggle,—among the giants of the time there will be one central and supreme figure,—that of William Lloyd Garrison; and only by reference to his preëminent and commanding character can the era with its great events be explained.

And that which gave Mr. Garrison this preëminence of position and power was the clearness of perception, the singleness of purpose, the self-consecrating earnestness of conviction, with which from the first he grasped the moral idea in the conflict. It was the exceptional greatness of his moral nature that made the greatness of his character and gave to his career that dramatic unity and completeness by which it became one of the chief historic forces of the period. There were anti-slavery men and women before he appeared. There were movements and societies looking towards the abolition of slavery before he was born. But not until he came does the inhumanity of the slave system seem to have been seized and held up before the public conscience with such an all-absorbing and overmastering intensity of moral conviction. There were men engaged with him in the anti-slavery struggle who possessed a more varied culture and a richer learning than he; many who brought to it a larger experience; some who in purely intellectual strength may have been his superiors; others who had a more brilliant imagination or a finer philosophical talent. But among them all there was none who stood in such commanding attitude by the possession of moral genius. It was this that entitled him to his unquestioned leadership; this that nerved his clear and logical intellect to the mastery of a public mission in which he had mighty helpers and mighty foes, but no superior on either side. The era was fertile in great men. But in this one element of moral majesty he stood greater than the greatest of them. By virtue of this he towered supreme among his friends and was more than a match for the strongest of his enemies.

The anti-slavery idea attracted to his side a brilliant array of intellect and culture and moral heroism. No reform movement had ever more reason to be proud of the ability and character of its advocates. But none took his central place. Wendell Phillips brought the resources of his Cambridge culture, the prestige of his family name and wealth, the noble enthusiasms of his nature, laid them all upon the altar, and became the incomparable orator of the anti-slavery platform. Theodore Parker, with a master's blows like Garrison's own and a kindred nature, became the doughty, invincible champion of the anti-slavery idea in the pulpit. Charles Sumner was its incorruptible statesman, bearing it with a martyr's fidelity to triumph in the United States Senate. John G. Whittier was its poet, singing it in ballads and hymns into the hearts of the American people. Ralph Waldo Emerson was its meditative, scholarly thinker, and naturalized the idea in the highest philosophy and literature of the country. John Quincy Adams, having filled all the public offices which his country could give and an honorable ambition acquire, made it the noblest ambition of his life to champion the cause as a representative of the people in Congress, and died with the halo of its coming glory on his brow. Lucretia Mott and Lydia Maria Child were among the heroic and saintly women who gave of their grace and strength to domesticate the idea in the stanchest and purest homes in the land. Harriet Beecher Stowe sent it in the pathos of a matchless story to millions of readers all round the globe. John Brown was its Old Testament Gideon, fired with a prophet's zeal and impatient to buckle on not only the sword of the spirit but the sword of steel, in the righteous work. Horace Greeley was its able, indomitable editor, carrying the conflict into the arena of the political newspaper. Frederick Douglass gathered in his own person the wrongs and woes of his enslaved race, and through his eloquent lips the slave's own cry was heard praying the nation for justice and mercy. Abraham Lincoln was the national executive chief, peer among the world's greatest rulers, who came in due time, when that cry had won a hearing, to guide the nation through the irrepressible conflict of arms in which the moral conflict had culminated, and to sign the immortal proclamation of freedom as the ripened result of the struggle. But among all these remarkable characters who stand out in such prominence in their various positions in this great era of our national history, and hundreds of others whose names will be scarcely less honored in the annals of the period, Garrison will hold by unquestioned right his central preëminent place, head and shoulders above them all, as representing in his person the dominant moral power of the crisis. Other great workers and leaders, doing vast and valiant service in the cause, which none recognized more gratefully or generously than he, yet shared some other interest with this, or trusted less exclusively the method of moral appeal. To him this was the one interest, supreme and all-dominating, bending all his faculties of mind and heart and soul and strength to its service; and the method of moral appeal was his one instrumentality. And thus, in this rare depth and intensity and clearness of his moral conviction may be found the source of very much of the inspiration which came to all these sharers and helpers in the work.

In a similar way it was that the great men who were his opponents found in him their master. The keenness and purity of his moral perception armed his naturally vigorous intellect with an impregnable logic. He was the "one man north of Mason and Dixon's line," as Mr. Phillips on this point said the other day in that crowning effort of eloquence over the dead body of his friend, "who was able to confront the logic of John C. Calhoun and South Carolina with an assertion direct and broad enough to make an issue and necessitate a conflict of two civilizations."

And this is the lesson of Mr. Garrison's life that comes most conspicuously before us for contemplation and instruction,—for instruction especially to the American pulpit and churches,—the greatness, the commanding power, the absolute supremacy, that lies in moral strength. He was the genuine prophet of the anti-slavery conflict. And none of the old Hebrew prophets ever took their stand more impregnable, or with more evidence of having divine authority, on the eternal law of righteousness. It was thus that he wrought with "the Eternal Power not ourselves that makes for righteousness." There was a "Thus saith the Lord" in his rebukes and appeals that went home to the consciences of people with as much force as did ever the voice of Isaiah among the recreant Hebrews. He was built, indeed, in large measure, after the model of the old Hebrew prophets; and nothing came more aptly to his lips, or was sent home to guilty consciences with a more unerring aim, than Scriptural quotations which he was wont to apply to the sins of the slaveholders and their abettors. When the churches were summoned year after year to their formal fasts, and were turning year after year a deaf ear to the appeal of the slave, with what scathing rebuke would he repeat the old words: "Behold ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness. . . . Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? Is it to bow down his head as a bulrush and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? Wilt thou call this a fast and an acceptable day unto the Lord? Is not this the fast that I have chosen?—to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke?" And when the churches and clergy were afraid of agitation and debarred the subject of justice to the slave from their meetings, his clarion voice would ring out from the old book,—the book that they declared to be an infallible divine revelation,—"Bring no more vain oblations: incense is an abomination unto me; the feasts and Sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, the solemn meeting, I cannot abide: it is iniquity. . . . And when ye make many prayers, I will not hear, for your hands are full of blood. Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well; seek righteousness, relieve the oppressed; do justice to the fatherless, plead for the widow. Come now, let us reason together, saith the Lord."

It was in this character of a genuine prophet of righteousness that Garrison first entered on his public career; and nothing but the actual possession of the moral power involved in such a rôle won for him a hearing and forced the issue he presented upon public attention. If it had not been for this moral power behind his words putting authority into them, the words with which he first greeted the public would have been mere bombast only to be laughed at by people too busy to listen again, or have been regarded as the impracticable ravings of a fanatic,—which, indeed, he was often called even by those who were compelled in spite of themselves to listen to him. It was with such words as these, for instance, that the first number of the Liberator was issued, when he was but twenty-five years old: "I am in earnest,—I will not equivocate,—I will not excuse,—I will not retreat a single inch,—AND I WILL BE HEARD." Only the possession of an exceptionally majestic moral nature guaranteeing the complete fulfilment of such words,—a fulfilment that has actually come,—could save them from being regarded as the frothy overflow of a young man's enthusiasm and conceit. But because he had the moral power the words are heroic,—none of Cromwell's with his sword ever more so. And, again, look at these sentences with which he threw the glove of challenge into the ranks of the foe. After giving the reasons for selecting Boston as the publishing-place for the Liberator, he says: "I determined at every hazard to lift up the standard of emancipation in the eyes of the nation, within sight of Bunker Hill, and in the birthplace of Liberty. That standard is now unfurled; and long may it float, unhurt by the spoliations of time or the missiles of a desperate foe,—yea, till every chain be broken and every bondman set free! Let Southern oppressors tremble,—let their secret abettors tremble,—let their Northern apologists tremble,—let all the enemies of the persecuted blacks tremble!" It was a case of the boy David with his sling and a stone from the brook against Goliath; and nothing but the fact that the sling was in the hand of a marksman who could not fail to send the stone straight to the one vulnerable spot in the panoply of the giant foe could save such a challenge from the ridicule of contemporaries and the oblivion of posterity. But the needed marksman was there! Again, to those who charged that he retarded the cause of emancipation by the violence of his invective, he replied: "The charge is not true. . . . On this question my influence, humble as it is, is felt at this moment to a considerable extent, and shall be felt in coming years,—not perniciously, but beneficially, not as a curse, but as a blessing; and posterity will bear testimony that I was right." He did not have to wait for the testimony of posterity. He lived to see the truth of his prophecy made manifest to all eyes. It was no young man's individual conceit. It was no mere outburst of shallow enthusiasm. It was a clear and burning perception of the law of righteousness.

Three things are necessary to sustain such self-assertion as this and save it from the charge of egotism and vain boastfulness; and in Garrison's case these three things existed in full measure.

First, it is necessary that the cause should be equal to the words. And on this point there can be no question. Never could the most valiant knight in the days of chivalry ask for a cause more worthy of his courage than was the cause which roused this young man's most ardent enthusiasm and called forth all of his mental and moral energy and received his soul's deepest and most sacred fealty. To emancipate millions of human beings from a bondage in which they were bought and sold like cattle, in which children were bred for the market and sold by their own fathers, in which families were separated, and women were forced to live in degrading concubinage, and men and women were driven to unpaid toil by the lash,—to emancipate a race from such imbruting, cruel bondage as this, and to lift from a nation the damning curse of such guilt, was the holy cause to which in his opening manhood he gave without reserve all his powers and solemnly devoted his life. The cause, then, was worthy of the enthusiastic and heroic words. It was a cause of our common humanity, and no petty conceit of any individual man; a cause calling for deeds to match the bravest words. Nor can we easily measure to-day the full moral proportions of the anti-slavery cause at the opening of the conflict, for the reason that we are so far away from the national conditions of opposition which the cause then encountered. Slavery is now abolished, and the nation rejoices that it has gone. The generation growing up to-day can hardly understand how this same nation, North as well as South, forty years ago closed its ears and steeled its heart against the very word abolition. The institution had so deeply imbedded itself in the life of the people that it lay its bloody hand on every State in the Union and grasped in its clutch every interest of society; and only a few rare souls had the temerity to think that the institution could be destroyed without sacrificing these interests which it had seized as its own,—much less to see that upon its destruction depended the salvation of these interests. Commerce, politics, the Church, institutions of learning, social ties and standing, were all thus implicated in the existence of slavery. To intimate that justice demanded freedom for the negro was either met, therefore, with apathy or excited alarm and opposition. The conscience of the nation had become callous to the slave's wrongs. Self-interest had dulled the national intellect to the incongruity of such a system with the civilization of the nineteenth century. Free thought was throttled; free speech was silenced. The press with rare exceptions was slavery's tool. Even the great majority of the best men and women in the land acquiesced in the system as an obligation of patriotism, even when seeing the evil of it. The only amelioration deemed practicable was to wash out the stains, not to remove the grasp of the bloody hand. Not only, then, is the cause to which Garrison devoted himself to be measured by the positive beneficence it aimed to accomplish, but by the extent of the national apathy it had to convert and the open opposition it had to meet and conquer.

Secondly, it is necessary that one who uses such words as those with which Garrison, at twenty-five years of age, challenged the attention of the country should have an adequate intellectual perception of their meaning and of the vastness of the problem he undertakes to solve. Sometimes the moral sentiment greatly outruns the intellect. When enthusiasm captures the judgment, a man may be a good balloonist, but he is no leader of an army. Garrison's mental faculties were infused with his moral enthusiasm, but they were not captured nor silenced by it. Side by side with his moral greatness he had an uncommonly large measure of common-sense. Though called by his foes a madman, he had really great practical sagacity and coolness of judgment. He was a close reasoner; and few encountered him in argument on any subject who did not feel both the weight and the edge of his mental power. He took his stand on the ground of "Immediate and Unconditional Emancipation," not only by the pressure of moral impulse, but by the compulsion of logic, tested and strengthened by his own observations and experience. He saw, not only that the slave had a right to immediate and absolute freedom, but that slavery, each year that it continued, was bringing incalculable damage of every kind to the nation, and that the scheme of gradual emancipation and colonization, however sincerely supported by many of its advocates, was really working in the interest of slavery. But on this point of his complete mental grasp of the problem to whose solution he summoned the country, let his comrade in the struggle testify. Wendell Phillips says: "If anything more prominently than another strikes one in this career, . . . it is the plain, sober, unmixt commonsense, the robust English element which underlies Cromwell, which explains Hampden, which gives the color that distinguishes 1640 in England from 1790 in France. No erratic mistakes, no enthusiasm that got beyond the feeling of earth, rising unsupported in the air; no mistake of method; no miscalculation of time; no unmeasured confidence in forces; no miscalculation of opposition. Whoever mistook, Garrison seldom mistook. Fewer mistakes in that long agitation of fifty years can be charged to his account than to any American in public life." This is testimony from one who served by his side, and from whom he sometimes differed; it is confirmed by others who knew him well, and is conclusive. With all his power of moral enthusiasm, Garrison had a clear mental perception of the work he had undertaken, which balanced and directed his enthusiasm and made it effective. His understanding was of admirable poise, and the fitting instrument of his moral purpose.

Thirdly, it is necessary that one who uses such heroic words as those with which Garrison began his public career should evince his full and sincere belief in the words, by his own utter and self-forgetful consecration to the fulfilment of them. And on this point there can be not even the smallest question. No man's entire consecration of himself to the cause he had espoused was ever more manifest to all beholders than was his. From the beginning to the end of his career, no thought of any selfish advantage tarnished the pure gold of his chivalric devotion to human rights. Subjected to persecution, hunted by every kind of opposition and hate, yet no enemy was ever dastardly enough to breathe a suspicion against his sincerity, his integrity, the purity of his purpose, and the unselfish, spotless fidelity of his life. Not even Jesus himself could have with more utter self-forgetfulness and self-abnegation devoted his life to the welfare of the poor and the lowly and the suffering than has this apostle and prophet of liberty, who has lived right here among us in America in this nineteenth century. Endowed with faculties that might have lifted into high places of public favor and renown had he followed the objects which ordinarily stir men's ambitions, he turned deliberately aside from all these courses and took the road where obloquy and scorn and poverty and bitter malignity were sure to be his portion, but where he saw his suffering fellow-men fallen among thieves, left wounded, bleeding, and despoiled by the wayside, with none to help. To this most contemned and unrepentable cause of the time he brought all his capacity, all his manhood.

Let young men and young women who would learn to live unselfishly, who aspire to devote themselves to humanity's good, read his story: not literally to copy his life, for the historic conditions for just such a career are happily passed away; nor can any life, however sublime, be safely copied, letter for letter, line for line, by another life; but let them read his story for moral stimulus, for inspiration to deeds of heroic self-command and self-denial, for the example of the glory and strength of a life which is subjected through and through to the supremacy of moral law. Was there ever a sublimer faith in an idea, or a more genuine, practical devotion to a principle, than that with which he began the publication of the Liberator, with not a single subscriber pledged, with all the organized forces of society against him, with only one man as helper, with an obscure garret for both printing-office and lodging, and with so little returns in money that only the meagerest daily food could be allowed? The Liberator became a mighty power in the land. It was read by Congressmen, it was read by editors, it was read even in the South. But it was a missionary power. It was never financially self-supporting, and its editor lived on the charity of friends and the voluntary contributions of believers in the cause. To compromise a principle for the sake of gaining a personal end was impossible with him. The word expediency was never on his lips nor in his heart. Tricksters and trimmers, whether in politics or the church or social life, he despised. Right was the one word he knew in the application of the moral law to conduct, and he took the straightest road towards it. In assuming the editorship of a paper in Bennington, Vt., when only twenty-two or twenty-three years old, he announced certain principles which were ingrained in his very nature and which controlled the conduct of his life. His paper, he said, "should be trammelled by no interest, biased by no sect, awed by no power." And to this pledge he was heroically loyal through his whole career. It was the key to his destiny. He took counsel neither of the fear nor favor of men. He asked nothing for himself, either as reward for service or recognition of ability or exemption from tasks. He asked only what the Law of Righteousness required him to do and to demand for his fellow-men.

The three essential conditions, then, for justifying the words of Garrison's challenge to the slave-power of the country are amply satisfied. He had a cause that matched the words. He had a mental perception and grasp that matched the moral enthusiasm which impelled the words. And he exhibited a practical self-consecration of life that matched both his mental conviction and his moral enthusiasm, and transformed the words into living deeds and set them blazing with light in the imperishable history of his country.

And this is the man, carrying with him to judgment this life of self-sacrifice, this unwavering fidelity to moral principle, this untiring devotion for fifty years to human rights in the face of the bitterest hostility, this unquestioned integrity and purity and singleness of heart, against whose name, moreover, in all the relations of private and domestic life, as husband, father, son, neighbor, we might almost write the word perfect, and whose heart, "as tender as a woman's, as pure as a child's," was open with sympathy and help to every cry of human misery, and who wrote on the tablet of his daily duties not only devotion to the slave, but every object that concerns human welfare and progress: the suppression of intemperance, the reformation of the drunkard, the elevation of woman, the cause of peace, the demands of education, the abolition of all mental shackles, the aid of the prisoner and the criminal, the cure of licentiousness,—this is the man, going from earth with his hands full of broken fetters and his shoulders loaded with the burdens which he had lifted from other peoples lives, with regard to whom some of the religious newspapers and clergy are now debating whether he had a sound and saving religious faith! The Methodist ministers in Boston the other day, to their honor be it spoken, voted in spite of the persistent opposition of a strong minority, and it must be added with glorious inconsistency with their creed, that such a life was God-directed and God-inspired. All honor to them who so thought and so said,—though it is of little account to him. The man who brought the American churches to their judgment-day forty years ago and wrote over their doors, "Wanting in humanity," where the sentence will be read of all history, does not need to-day for his reputation on earth or in heaven the passport of any of the churches or of any body of clergy.

The truth is, however, that Garrison had a mighty religious faith, and he lived and wrought in its power. But it was not the kind that is defined in the creeds of the popular theology or commonly admitted into the churches. Benevolence, reverence, conscience, firmness, fidelity, if there be any truth in phrenology, were written in unmistakable conspicuousness on his head, and, if there be no truth in phrenology, might have been read of all men in his heart and conduct. He was deeply religious by nature. At his mother's knee, and from her faithful soul, he imbibed the faith with which he began his life-work. He accepted then, as she did, the evangelical creed of Christendom, and became versed in the Bible, which afterwards furnished him so many strong weapons in his warfare for justice. He himself in his youth joined an Orthodox Congregational church. An intimate friend says that upon his knees, with his open Bible before him, he solemnly consecrated himself to the cause of the slave. But when he took this cause of humanity as it lay burning in his heart to his own minister, and he turned a deaf ear to the story and warned him from taking such a road, when he carried his appeal to the churches and from one prominent minister to another and they would not read it nor open their doors to his voice, then his eyes were opened, and from that day forward he began to judge the creeds and churches, the ministers and their flocks, by the criterion of their fidelity to the slave. And thus he was led to the ground of free and natural religion. In working for the emancipation of the slave, he emancipated his own mind from the thralldom of medieval superstitions, and from the authority of dogma and ecclesiasticism. He brought everything to the test of squareness with reason, with justice, with mercy. All claims for a divine revelation or for sacred books or days or observances must be subjected to this test. And as an indirect consequence of his work he has been one of the greatest teachers of a rational, free, humane, and natural religion that our country has known. His teachings, made illustrious in his life, have liberated thousands of minds from bondage to the old theologies. I may here bear testimony to the personal fact that it was through the reading of the Liberator, in the Quaker home of my youth, that I first was led to question the authority of the popular creeds and the infallibility of the Bible. That sheet entered as a very important factor in my early education, and through my pulpit-work for twenty years the teachings of William Lloyd Garrison have been echoed.

This most Christ-like character of the nineteenth century the Christian Church turned from its door. The churches disowned the moral idea which it was their special office and privilege to champion, spurned as grand an opportunity as had ever been proffered to their hands, and thus lost the moral inspiration of that sublime struggle. Finding after repeated disappointments that the Church as a whole (for the exceptions only proved the rule) turned aside from his moral appeal, he took it beyond their walls, and there fought the greatest battle for practical righteousness that our own or any time has known. Shaking the dust of the synagogues from his feet, the prophet went out, with his faith in the principle unshaken, to the Gentile world, and gathered a church of humanity. And thereby he made a new definition of religion for America, and established a criterion for fellowship which the churches with their creeds and covenants could not reach. As Paul preached for his time "Christ and him crucified" as the test of faith, so Garrison proclaimed as the religious test for his era, "The American slave and him crucified"! He proclaimed to the faithless time as the only saving religion that which finds—

"Our Father in our brother's face,
Our Maker in His poor."

It was a gospel that ploughed a furrow right through the creeds, and shook the churches to their foundation. There were scores of the anti-slavery leaders, and thousands within the ranks of the abolition party, who were educated like Garrison in the evangelical theology, but who, like him, had to break away from its chains when this new gospel of humanity won the allegiance of their hearts. Several bright lights were lost to the evangelical pulpit and shone instead on anti-slavery platforms. In numerous cases, the careful learning, the trained exegetical faculty, which had been designed for the defence of a sound theology, were turned against the Church and its doctrines. Thus the Church not only missed the moral stamina it might have gained from championship of the anti-slavery cause, but lost a host of its purest consciences and of its most robust and independent intellects. It trimmed its sails to catch the breeze of popular favor, but it lost its anchorage in those deep moral instincts of the popular heart which always gravitate at last to right and humanity.

And in the faith of this gospel of humanity, which was to him a mighty gospel of divinity as well, Garrison lived and worked and died. And it was a faith that gave him a great hope and a great joy, as well as a great impulse to labor. Sternly as his sense of duty held him to his task, black as were the clouds of malignity that gathered over his head, he was yet in the spirit of his daily life lifted into an atmosphere of unbroken sunshine and serene content. His faith in the final triumph of his cause was as unshakable as his belief in its justice. He knew that the infinite powers of truth and right and pity were working for it, and what could the petty spite or self-interest of finite man avail against it? Wendell Phillips says this was "the happiest life he ever witnessed." It was so because in such thorough and fine accord with the eternal law of righteousness. In all the turmoil and strife of his eventful career, the great tides of infinite right and love swept through his being and lifted him into gladness and peace.

That he was faultless is not to be claimed. The perfect model for humanity has not yet appeared. Yet I remember to have heard but one fault counted against him,—one fault in two aspects,—his intolerance of opposing opinions, and his intemperate denunciation of the supporters of slavery. But this is a charge against which he may be defended in the same way that Luther and Isaiah and Jesus may be defended against a similar charge. If more special defence is needed, he himself made the best defence when he wrote with reference to this very charge: "I am aware that many object to the severity of my language; but is there not cause for severity? I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice. On this subject I do not wish to think or speak or write with moderation. No! No! Tell a man whose house is on fire to give a moderate alarm; tell him to moderately rescue his wife from the hands of the ravisher; tell the mother to gradually extricate her babe from the fire into which it has fallen; but urge me not to use moderation in a cause like the present!" But count it a fault. It yet was but a flaw in the grain of the marble from which this grandly heroic character was chiselled, and leaves hardly a blemish on the clear-cut majesty of the features. Reckon up all the faults that criticism with its most searching taper can find, and yet there is no American of our century to whom the young can be pointed with more confidence for moral inspiration. And there is no preacher of our own or any era in our history to whose life the American churches can be pointed as a sounder guide in problems of the practical application of the law of righteousness. If the churches, in the coming fifty years, shall have so learned the lessons of his memorable career as to have recovered that hold of the moral sentiment which they lost when they disowned him and his invincible faith in the divinity of practical justice, then they may have justified their right to continued existence.

ITALY.

All men are interested in Italy. All go to that country who can. The general idea is that a people can be great only once, that nations culminate like individuals, and then sink into decline and insignificance. The people of Italy seem to be an exception to this rule. Italy seems to be forever modern. What more thoroughly modern men have lived in this century than Cavour and Mazzini and Garibaldi? What men have been more loyal to the free spirit of the nineteenth century? What nobler personality has appeared in the Italian peninsula, from the far dawn of history even to the current date, than Mazzini? Many prophesy that at no distant day Italy will once more be the leading Latin community, taking precedence of France even, because France is tainted with a certain Celtic fickleness and passionateness which ever and anon cause her (to use a bucolical figure of speech) to kick over her milk-pail just when it is full. The Italian character is earnest, and is not marred by that frivolity, which, while it has not kept the French from being a great people, has nevertheless always lowered France in the estimation of the world. The Italian language is no longer what it was for a century before Alfieri appeared,—the mere vehicle of Della Cruscan insipidities and ineptitudes. It is now as much the language of modern thought as English, or German, or French.

The day apparently has gone by when able Italians must go to France to find a career. Italy is a great, autonomous community. All her members are subject to a common centre and heart, from which the sap of a vigorous national life is propelled through every vein, artery, and fibre. Italy can now find work enough for her great men at home. Meantime, in her days of disunion and consequent feebleness, the Italian race contributed Napoleon Bonaparte, Mirabeau, and many other overshadowing names, to the French Pantheon. Rome was long, long ago republican, after the peculiar fashion of the pagan foreworld. Then it was imperial, then ecclesiastical. At last it is royal again as it was in the days of the Etrurian Lucumones, the Tarquins; but it is royal only for a time. It gravitates toward a popular republicanism of the type of to-day, with an irresistible tendency. At any rate, that is the aim of the great liberator Garibaldi, than whom no truer and more unselfish popular leader ever lived. There is not a particle of the demagogue in him. The favor neither of king nor people can turn his head, which is habitually level. He is not seeking to enfranchise the great mass of his countrymen and clothe them with manhood suffrage in order that he may concentrate their votes upon himself. It is the cause and not himself which is foremost. In fact, Garibaldi redeems the whole class of professional patriots from the proverbial suspicion which attaches to their motives, by his splendid oblivion of self. He is a man of convictions so intense that they will give him no rest until his ideals of right have become concrete in actual liberal institutions.

It is hardly possible to convey in language any adequate idea of the hunger and thirst of such noble enthusiasts as Garibaldi for a renovated society and a thorough abolition of the old order of things, which systematically kept Italy disunited and humiliated by foreign control through so many exasperating years, until, thanks to Sardinian statesmanship and the logic of events, her unity became an accomplished fact. Garibaldi has seen a great fulfillment, but he is still discontented and unsatisfied. Had the vulgar ambition which actuates ordinary popular leaders been his, he might, with his immense personal prestige with his countrymen, have satiated it long ago. But riches, honors, troops of friends, would afford to Garibaldi no comfort in his declining years. The realization of his political hopes and ideals can give him joy and satisfaction alone. Patriotic and humanitarian enthusiasts like Mazzini and Garibaldi are as free from vulgar greed and selfishness as scientific enthusiasts like Humboldt and Agassiz. Even at a time when some of our own countrymen pronounce universal popular suffrage a failure, Garibaldi desires it for Italy, although the masses of her people are in a quite primitive state of illiteracy and credulity.

The priestphobia of Garibaldi is well known. It is shared by all the leaders of the republican movement in Europe, who recognize in hierarchies their chief foe and obstruction. The Latin saying, that the priest is everywhere and always the enemy of mankind, exactly expresses Garibaldi's conviction on this subject. He repudiates a national church recognized by law. He is also anxious that some effectual cure of poverty and mendicancy should be devised, especially of the mendicancy, which is so unabashed and general in the Italian peninsula, that the tourist is continually running the gauntlet of beggars everywhere. The example of mendicant orders and of men canonized for leading lives of deliberate indigence or holy poverty must have been largely the cause and sanction of the proverbial and unblushing Italian beggary which half the time has not the excuse of want, but is indulged in as a means of gain.

The well-fed Italian peasant, and his well-fed children, who show their vigor by their agility, regard the forestiero, in his transit through their territory, as their legitimate game. If their solicitations take effect, well and good. They are so much in. If they fail of extracting any batocchi, they are not lowered at all in their own self-esteem, as even the men and women are mere grown-up children. It seems that there is still an immense amount of ecclesiastical property unappropriated by the State. Garibaldi wants it sold, and the proceeds of the sale devoted to reclaiming the marsh lands, which are said to constitute two-thirds of the Italian soil in extent. Byron says that, ploughed by the sunbeams solely, Italy would suffice for the world's granary. But in other days, agriculture was so neglected that her chief city had to depend on outside supplies for sustenance, as England, with her crowded manufacturing and commercial populace and her insufficient acreage, is beginning to depend on our blue-grass pastures and prairie wheat-fields for bread and beef. Perhaps the fertility of Italy is such and so spontaneous as to make her independent of scientific agriculture and patent agricultural implements, the primitive Virginia plough still sufficing.

But our limits will not allow of our going farther with an enumeration of the reforms, wise and otherwise, which Garibaldi and his followers in their recent deliberative gathering have proclaimed their purpose of inaugurating to cure the prevailing discontent in Italy. He thinks that, if he can get manhood suffrage, that will give him everything else which he desires. It is quite true that the suffrage is the great instrument of the republican movement everywhere, but it is also true that other things must be equal to it. Garibaldi's priestly foes have shown themselves quite capable of pressing it into their service in Belgium and elsewhere. Cannot the priests as readily become politicians in Italy as in France, where fifty thousand of them have lately been beating the drum ecclesiastical to rally opposition to M. Ferry's educational bill, which disfranchises their order as public instructors of youth?

In regard to the probable political regeneration of the Italian people, it must be remembered that they have never become effete. They have simply undergone periods of mental and moral lethargy and stagnation, from which they have again and again aroused themselves to come to the front of civilization, as the history of the Italian republics shows. It is not only art which is Italian in its origin, but modern literature, modern science, and modern commerce and manufactures, and these departments include all our modern activity. Weighted though she be with the ruins of half a dozen civilizations, and still staggering under the burden of obsolescent institutions, Italy could yet produce on her worn soil a thoroughly live statesman like Cavour, a fact which attests her invincible vitality and modernness. It was not so very long ago that Venice was what Paris is now,—the universal resort of people of leisure and note. It was there that the brilliant Lady Mary Wortley Montagu spent the last years of her life, thence dating multitudes of her letters, which will remain forever readable.—Boston Herald, June 15.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

It will be remembered that a bust of Frederick Douglass was recently placed in Sibley Hall, of the University of Rochester. The ceremonies were quite informal—too informal, we think, as commemorating a deserved tribute from the people of Rochester to one who will always rank as among her most distinguished citizens. Mr. Douglass himself was not notified officially of the event, and therefore could in no public manner take notice of it. He was, however, informed privately of it, and responded most happily, as will be seen by the following letter which we are permitted to publish:—

WASHINGTON, D.C., June 25, 1879.

SAMUEL D. PORTER, Esq.:

My dear Sir,—I am extremely obliged to you for your kind and timely letter which came this morning, for it was a relief from a real cause of embarrassment. When first I read of the formal unveiling and the presentation of my bust to the city of Rochester, the speeches made on the occasion by eminent gentlemen,—notably the remarks of Dr. Anderson, the honored President of Rochester University, an institution which has done so much to make the name of the city illustrious,—I felt an almost irresistible impulse to do or say something out of the common way to some one of my old friends and fellow-citizens, which should express, however crudely, something of the grateful sentiment stirred in my breast by this distinguished honor. But as no one of the respected gentlemen active in the procurement of the testimonial said anything to me about it, and treated me as if I were out of the world, as all men should be when they are once reduced to marble, I began at last to think that silence on my part was perhaps the best way to observe the proprieties of the occasion. Now, however, I am relieved. You have made it easy for me to speak to express my earnest acknowledgments to the committee of gentlemen having this matter in charge and who have conducted it to completion. Incidents of this character in my life do much amaze me. It is not, however, the height to which I have risen, but the depth from which I have come, that most amazes me. It seems only a little while ago, when a child, I might have been seen fighting with old "Nep," my mother's dog, for a small share of the few crumbs that fell from the kitchen table; when I slept on the hearth, covering my feet from the cold with the warm ashes and my head with a corn bag; only a little while ago, dragged to prison to be sold to the highest bidder, exposed for sale like a beast of burden; later on, put out to live with Covey, the negro breaker; beaten and almost broken in spirit, having little hope either for myself or my race: yet here I am alive and active, and, with my race, enjoying citizenship in the freest and prospectively the most powerful nation on the globe. In addition to this, you and your friends, while I am yet alive, have thought it worth while to preserve my features in marble and to place them in your most honored institution of learning, to be viewed by present and future generations of men. I know not, my friend, how to thank you, and the gentlemen who have acted with you, for this distinguished honor. My attachment to Rochester, my home for more than a quarter of a century, will endure with my life.

Very gratefully and truly yours,

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

TWO ILLUSTRIOUS WOMEN.

The unconscious influence of a strong, superior, noble nature upon marked cotemporary characters is finely illustrated by the confessions of Robert Collyer. He has just decided to leave Chicago, and accept the pastorate of the First Unitarian Church of New York City, and in the course of a late conversation he related interesting incidents of personal history. While a local Methodist preacher in one of the suburbs of Philadelphia, he was in the habit of attending a lyceum in the district school-house, where, among various questions of religion and politics, abolitionism was discussed. Mr. Collyer, who was an emancipationist, says, "Lucretia Mott, who had recently removed to that neighborhood, took part in the discussions, in her quiet, solid, orderly way. I thought I was great in the Bible, but Lucretia Mott turned out to be far ahead of anything I knew about the Scriptures as they touched the great, vital questions before the lyceum. I soon saw I was in the wrong, and promptly went over to the ranks of the Garrison abolitionists. Mrs. Mott never stopped at any point at which we expected she would stop in argument, but launched out in other directions, and threw new light on many dark subjects. I gradually began to see that my confidence on many points was leaving me. I could not feel sure any longer about total depravity, and I got to doubting the doctrine of eternal punishment. I felt myself gradually becoming estranged from the Methodist faith."

The influence of Mrs. Mott on the young preacher was continued by the sermons of Dr. Furness, and it was not long before, at the quarterly meeting of the sect, he was questioned by the presiding elder upon the articles of faith of his church. Mr. Collyer avowed his disbelief in eternal damnation, in the doctrine of total depravity, and the liberal inspiration of the Bible, and accordingly made a final adieu to the Methodist denomination. According to his candid avowal, all this change and growth came from the words of the grand Quaker woman, who little knew what seed she was sowing in the humble school-house on those winter evenings.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton, also, ascribes her religious emancipation to Lucretia Mott. The writer was one of a trio of women who spent a happy day, a few months since, at the tasteful home over which Mrs.

Stanton presides with so much dignity. And a delightful home it is, where the energizing and inspiring influence of her versatile nature radiates like sunshine. If the platform utterances of Mrs. Stanton are impressive and eloquent, it is in the sparkle and abandon of private life that all her winning qualities are fully realized. The day was crowded with conversation so brilliant that it would have made the fortune of a mere woman of the world. It abounded in catholic, genial, but critical judgments of men and measures, of reminiscences of women and their labors, and of prophecies of the future. For little has been done within the memory of the living generation, in which she has not been an interested spectator or worker. However much she may be misunderstood abroad, beside her own hearthstone, where her white hairs are crowned with true glory, five sons and two daughters have been reared, who look to her wisdom with genuine veneration.

During that day, Mrs. Stanton described her first meeting with Mrs. Mott. "It was in London, about thirty-five years ago, at an anti-slavery convention," said the former, "and every moment when I could find Mrs. Mott alone was eagerly improved by me in drawing out her views upon the Bible and religion. From that period dates my emancipation from religious bigotry."—Religio-Philosophical Journal, June 28.

FOREIGN.

THE FOURTH CENTENARY of the foundation of the University of Copenhagen was celebrated in that city on the 4th inst. No less than four thousand people took part in the celebration, including the royal family and all the highest civic and military authorities. The festive address was delivered by the Rector Magnificus Dr. Madvig.—Nature.

THE COUNCIL of the British Secular Union has appointed a committee to prepare a burial service adapted to the use of secularists. They have also appointed a committee to compile a hymn-book suitable for secular meetings. It is hoped that these committees will have completed their labors early in the winter. Another committee is preparing a report upon the Criminal Code Bill, with a view to the action which should be taken by secular societies throughout the country. Portions of the bill affect the freedom of Sunday, and one means of influencing legislation it is thought would be the taking of an active part by secularists in all local movements for the opening of public libraries and other educational institutions on Sunday.

IT IS PROPOSED to establish a Zoological Station on the Aberdeen coast, in connection with the natural history laboratory of the University, similar to those already instituted for the universities of Paris, Vienna, and Leyden. The objects of such a station are: First, to supply the laboratory with fresh animals for purposes of teaching and research. Second, to enable students to become practically acquainted with natural history, and to afford them opportunities of advanced study and independent research during vacations. Third, to afford means for the exhaustive study of the marine fauna. For the establishment of such a station on the smallest possible scale, it is necessary to have (1) a movable shed or house with suitable fittings; (2) a large fishing boat and a small two-oared boat; (3) nets and dredges; (4) aquaria glassware and miscellaneous apparatus; (5) the services of a fisherman and a boy for a part of the year.—Nature.

THE OUT-DOOR PROPAGANDA, under the auspices of various secular associations in England has been resumed the present season. Interesting and successful meetings are reported in connection with the North London Secular Society, Midland Railway Arches, St. Pancras, Sunday, June 22. A lecture was delivered by Mr. Foote to a very large audience, upon "Bible Morality." Some opposition was offered by persons of Christian prepossessions, to which Mr. Foote replied. At Clerkenwell Green a meeting was held on the same day (under the auspices of the Eclectic and Freethought Association). The meeting was addressed by Mr. West in the morning on "The Exodus, and in the evening a lecture was delivered by Mr. Johnson. A successful gathering is also reported to have occurred on Woodhouse Moor, to hear Mr. Judge lecture on "Secularism and Christianity Compared." "The lecture was a very able one, was listened to throughout without the least interruption. At the close, discussion being invited, three gentlemen spoke in opposition, and were well answered by the lecturer. One of the gentlemen challenged Mr. Judge to further debate the question that day fortnight, to which Mr. Judge consented."

SPEAK OF A MAN'S marble brow and he will glow with conscious pride; but allude to his wooden head and he's mad in a minute. Language is a slippery thing to fool with much.—Jewish Times.

A LITTLE BOY of Providence, not yet out of his short clothes, was asked by his grandmother the other day how he had torn his dress. He replied that it had "got caught on a clover leaf."—New York Tribune.

ONE OF THE OLD SETTLERS at the Isles of Shoals seeing the name of Psyche on the hull of a yacht the other day, spelled it out slowly, and then exclaimed: "Well, if that ain't the durndest way to spell fish!"

AN IRISH GENTLEMAN having purchased an alarm-clock, an acquaintance asked him what he intended to do with it: "Och," answered he, "sure I've nothing to do but pull the string and wake myself."—Cambridge Tribune.

A CURE FOR TOOTHACHE.—Boy: "What are you crying for, Sally?" Girl: "'Cos I got the toothache." Boy: "You go round to my grandmother: she'll show yer what to do; she knows how to take hers out and put 'em back whenever she wants."—Fun.

MISTRESS (to new cook): "Now, Sarah, remember if you are strictly honest and economical in your marketing, I will give you a few shillings extra per month." New Cook: "Thank you, ma'am; I will think it over, and let you know in the evening!"—Funny Folks.

A NEGRO PREACHER described hell as ice-cold, where the wicked froze to all eternity. Asked why, he said: "'Cause I don't dare tell dem people nuffin else. Why, if I say hell is warm, some of dem old rheumatic niggers be wantin' start down dar de very fus' fro's."—Cambridge Tribune.

A RUSTIC BRIDEGROOM was complimented by one of his acquaintances on the charming appearance of his bride. "She has the most lovely color I have ever seen," remarked the friend. "Yes, it ought to be good," pensively replied the groom; "she paid a dollar for just a little bit in a saucer."—American Israelite.

"WHAT SHALL I preach about?" said a minister to the pastor of a colored flock which he was about to address. "Well, mos' any subject will be 'ceptable," was the reply; "only I'd like to gib you one word ob caution." "Ah! What is that?" "Well, ef I was you, I'd tech yer light on de Ten Commandments." "Indeed! And why?" "Oh! cos I hab notise dat dey mos' always hab a damp'nin' effect on de congregation."

A PITTSBURGH newspaper, in a report of the commencement exercises at the Pennsylvania College for Girls, describes one of the fair graduates as "a young lady of moderately tall, graceful form, and calm, philosophic countenance, set off with eye-glasses, and made thus the more philosophic in appearance. In a sweet, simple, but somewhat rapid manner she read her essay. It treated of the necessity of a high ideal to rouse to exertion in life. Without ideals we are destitute of ennobling motives."

CHILDHOOD WISDOM.

BY SHELDON C. CLARK.

The mystic, wondrous wisdom
That unconsciously doth flow
Through the speeches and the sayings
Of Childhood's freshest glow
Rebukes the studied statements
Of philosopher and sage,
And teaches that all wisdom
Is not the fruit of Age.

There trickles through their speeches
Deepest lessons for the heart,
That our spirit never loses,
But our tongue cannot impart.
'Tis a tender, mystic teaching
To the soul on sacred things,
By spirits pure and sparkling,
From the central Being springs.

Like streamlets from the mountain,
Flowing downward to the plain,
Comes the laughter of the children
To the hearts that ache with pain;
For in its very ripple
It gleams with light and love,
More precious than it thinks not
On its mission from above.

O Childhood, in thy freedom
From the pomp and show of life,
Where the critic fears the critic
And existence is but strife,—
Oh, lead us back to Selfhood!
Appearance let us scorn!
Into the life of Nature
Let us again be born!

The Index.

BOSTON, JULY 17, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLSON Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases: i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

RATIONAL RATIONALISM.

In one of Herbert Spencer's introductory essays to his more comprehensive work on the study of sociology, which we regret is not at hand for illustrative reference here, he points out the common tendency in society to inconclusive and erroneous reasoning. This he shows is not peculiar to the ignorant classes, but largely to those that are regarded enlightened and intelligent. It has already been intimated that rationalism, notwithstanding its assumptions of superiority in this particular, and its incident perils, exhibits in no small degree the same mental characteristic. Of course, a moment's reflection enables us to see that with the limitations of human intelligence it could not be expected wholly otherwise. The mind may be free from the theological bias and yet subject to bias of various descriptions. Innumerable influences operate on the mind which aims at the most rationalistic independence, to warp its judgments and sway its course of action. Personal temperament is most powerful. Past associations of life, education, and culture; present social or other relations; a natural tendency to intellectual narrowness or but partial views of things, to conceit and intolerance; and the unregulated feelings and propensities of the lower nature are all, in a less or greater number and degree, important factors in determining a person's opinions. We wish we could feel that radicals are always free from any of these biases, but must frankly confess a considerable and somewhat intimate acquaintance among them has not enabled us to make the discovery. It is therefore, we hold, altogether a mistake to suppose that because a person has discarded the errors and absurdities to which his neighbor adheres, he must necessarily be more reasonable in every other respect. The renunciation of error in one form may be but the adoption of it in another. It requires something more than to have passed beyond the bounds of the old beliefs merely, or for one to avow himself a rationalist and ally himself with those who bear the name, to entitle him to all that such a distinction should imply. Theodore Parker relates that a person once came to him who declared he had the "gift of tongues," and Parker with his characteristic blunt decisiveness replied, "Let it appear."

If a person claims to have the "gift of tongues" or prophecy, if, in a word, he claims to be a rationalist or more reasonable than others, he cannot expect to get the credit of being what he professes, simply on his affirmation, or further than he supports it with evidence. It needs to be more emphasized and better understood among radicals, that an avowal of rationalism does not necessarily make one a rationalist.

There is another fact which radicals should consider more than they are sometimes accustomed to in this connection: It is that things are not necessarily bad and hence to be assailed because they are old, or good and hence to be approved because they are new. It needs something more to make a genuine reformer than an indiscriminate onslaught upon the institutions of society or to be willing to lead a crusade against its existing order, defective even though they be. It needs something more to make one a true hero or martyr than to brave the police, insult the more refined sensibilities and defame the purer instincts and better sentiments of society, for the sake of a small modicum of selfish notoriety. Of such irrationalities and vagaries rationalism has had, and still has, not a little, as well as the systems which it repudiates.

Let this not be considered as a reflection upon rationalism; as an insinuation against it. It is not conceding that the rationalistic principle is in any degree to be discredited, or that it is not the supreme and true one in its application to life and thought. It is not intended to depreciate in the least its incomparable glory, to detract from the superlative excellence of its grand achievements. Nay, rather would we contemplate rationalism as the hope of the world; the true Messiah, for which humanity has groaned and travelled through all the ages until now; the sovereign panacea for all its ills; that which is to overcome at last all the irrationalities of human life, even those of rationalism itself.

The great aim of rationalism, then, should be, not only to refute and overcome the errors of its environment, but also to secure a more rigid application of its great distinguishing principle within its nominal domain; to render it thorough and through in fact what it is in name. In the last number of THE INDEX, we dwelt upon the importance of comprehensiveness or breadth in rationalism as a means of external conquest and power. And here we return to this principle. It is in this spirit of comprehensiveness, in the reciprocity of ideas and fellowship which it signifies, that lie also the means of the internal advancement of rationalism, its own more self-consistent and pervading rationalistic development. This principle, we affirm, has never yet been carried out in rationalism. Instead of it, as we affirmed in our editorial of last week, we have had, and still have, numerous diversities and clashing divisions. How shall we ever be able to subject our ideas and principles to their requisite and legitimate tests unless we put into exercise a greater hospitality among us in respect to them. Exclusive societies, therefore, of rationalists, each striving to build up its particular phase of rationalism, and seeking and caring for no intercourse with those that differ from itself, is altogether out of keeping with such a movement, and utterly inimical to its progress. What we propose, then, is societies formed on the basis of entire freedom; societies in which all the different elements of which they are composed may, so far as practicable, obtain equal recognition; in which no single one shall claim special dictatorship or privilege; in which this spirit shall be so characteristic of it that no name even shall be accepted for its designation suggestive of less comprehensiveness. And in order to demonstrate that this conception is not a chimera, that it is the plan which gives the promise of the healthiest and best success, we need but point to existing evidence.

We know of no better example for this purpose than that which the Free Congregationalist Society of Florence, Mass., presents. It is one with which the readers of THE INDEX have some acquaintance. This society is founded upon the basis of absolute freedom. There is not a person in the land too ultra to obtain admission to its platform, provided he comes properly accredited in respect to character and intelligence. There is not one in the land too conservative to obtain a hearing from its platform, provided he is similarly accredited and there is a sufficient desire among the members of the society to entitle him to the invitation. This society is now in the seventeenth year of its existence. It has among its most active and earnest members materialists of the extreme type; in other words, persons who would ordinarily be classed as atheists. It has also a considerable number of Spiritualists, and some, no less interested and devoted, who still cleave to Christianity as the ideal of character and religious conception. And with these may be included persons of the various diversities of opinions and phases of mental independence that the freedom of such a fellowship would be likely to engender. It is its aim to provide, so far as may be expedient, speakers for its Sunday meetings, for a considerable portion of the time, who may be deemed satisfactory and fitting exponents of these different lines of liberalism. It is thus that there is hardly any class of liberalism or religion which has not at one time or another been represented upon its platform. In looking over the list of those who have been heard from it from time to time, there are the names of men and women, of black and white. There are those of Underwood and Seaver, of Garrison, Douglass, Pillsbury and others of their school, of Ralph Waldo Emerson and Alcott; of women like Mrs. Howe, Stanton, and Anthony; the name of the scientist Proctor, and those of less renown in science, distinguished Spiritualists, such as Denton, Stebbins, and Eccles; a Jewish rabbi and Christian ministers of various divisions of the Church.

Nor is the example just cited one of a weak and struggling existence. It is, on the other hand, flourishing and vigorous, and possesses a commanding influence in the community. It is only necessary, to make this apparent, to particularize as evidence its grand building with its admirable appurtenances, erected at a cost of upwards of fifty thousand dollars; its provisions for educational and social culture, for amusement, and for the young. We might point also to the Free Religious Association as a similar illustration of the principle of comprehensiveness and freedom we have been endeavoring to elucidate as the most effectual preventive of unreasonableness, or of rendering rationalism thoroughly rational.

Of course these illustrations do not apply to societies which crystallize, so to speak, around a single person. But these, the societies alike and their leaders, especially when standing outside of all Christian connection, long for such a broad fellowship as we have indicated, where their words may be helpful and stimulating, and where they may help to make rationalism more rational among those who are no longer under the yoke of bondage, but one with them in sympathy and the general direction of their aims. This, then, seems to us the indispensable practical specific for rendering rationalism what it professes to be. It is in breadth rather than narrowness, in fellowship and fraternity. It is not in repeating the folly of the churches, endeavoring to found sects and lams, allowing our special idea or prepossession, whatever it may be, to run away with us, but through organizations wisely adapted to the end, seeking to exercise and foster the rational mind. It is through the society of reasonable men and women,—in brief through all that serves to enlighten us, enables us to recognize the law within the law and to conform our lives to their unvarying uniformities, the dominion of reason over unreasonableness, passion, impulse, and caprice.

MR. WRIGHT'S EXCEPTIONS.

In another column of THE INDEX Mr. Wright takes some exceptions to an editorial of ours in the number of July 3d.

We regret that it seems proper for us to remind him, not to put too fine a point upon it, that if he had given the same pains to ascertain, that he has put us to verify what Mr. Abbot's idea of the Liberal League really was, before he sat down to his article, he would have at once increased his knowledge in this particular, saved himself from the necessity of a considerable part of his criticism at least, and us from what we should have preferred to be relieved, the need of replying to it. In Vol. VIII. (1877), p. 619, of THE INDEX, there is a communication by us entitled "The Church of Rationalism," presenting substantially the same views as those of the editorial upon which Mr. Wright makes his comments. At the close of this article, Mr. Abbot subjoins this editorial note: "Will our valued contributor be so good as to examine carefully the 'Form of Constitution for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues' recommended by the National League, and report in these columns the precise additions he would suggest to the plan there outlined, in order to constitute the local League a true 'Church of Rationalism.' Such an attempt on his part will, we suspect, show him that he has hitherto imperfectly comprehended the breadth and fulness of the Liberal League movement." Not quite persuaded yet in our own mind, feeling in common with Mr. Wright, and many others no doubt, that, irrespective of the scope which Mr. Abbot ascribes to its plan, the Liberal League was practically at least a movement mainly for political ends, and could not be made, to any considerable extent, anything apart from this, we followed up the statement above given with another communication in THE INDEX of Vol. IX., p. 67, under the caption, "Is the Liberal League equivalent to the Church of Rationalism?" which called forth this editorial note:—

"As we suspected, our valued contributor has forgotten to observe that the Liberal League is designed to do all that any liberal society can do. For proof of this, we simply quote these articles from the 'Form of Constitution for Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues' recommended by the 'National Liberal League.' We will cite one or two of these articles that bear most directly upon the point at issue.

"The Committee on Public Work shall mature measures for cooperating efficiently in the common cause with the National Liberal League, especially in circulating its documents, petitions, appeals, etc., and carrying out locally the various objects of the Liberal League movement.

"The Committee on Public Discussion shall mature measures for sustaining regular Sunday meetings for public debates, lectures, etc., and they shall be charged with the general conduct of the same.

"The Committee on Social Affairs shall mature measures for holding frequent social assemblies for the benefit of the younger members of the League, and also for regular Sunday meetings of a children's fraternity, to promote the moral instruction and social enjoyment of the children."

In a subsequent number of THE INDEX, Vol. IX., page 115, we made the "Acknowledgment" that the League was more comprehensive in its aims than we had supposed, and if its provisions were fully carried out it would in fact be the realization of all we conceived in what, for the want of a term of nearer or more convenient significance, we had called "The Church of Rationalism."

To this Mr. Abbot appended the following: "We thank Mr. Clark for his candid and highly honorable 'Acknowledgment,' which we hope will serve to call attention to the breadth and depth of the Liberal League movement in all its aspects."

Many quotations might be added from Mr. Abbot's editorials and various writings, to confirm our statement of what he dreamed the Liberal League might become, not in his sleep, but most wide-awake and conscious hours. It shows, indeed, how much larger and grander was his conception, as he strove earnestly to impress upon others, than was commonly supposed. Whether he builded better than he knew or not, it is plain that he builded much better than those who overran and perverted the League from the purposes for which it was planned, and are consequently solely accountable for its present disrupted and tarnished condition, could appreciate. His mistake was not, as Mr. Wright intimates, in making it too inclusive in its objects, but simply in the undue estimate which his own fine intellect and high moral nature led him to form of the intelligence and character of the professed liberals of the country to whom he was compelled to appeal for success. It was that the movement inevitably admitted a large influx of material with which it was impossible to carry forward any great work of reform. And this, Mr. Wright is destined to find true of the cause which he champions. Whether the party which he represents is justly or not to be regarded in alliance with the vendors of obscenity, it is useless to attempt to dodge the fact that it rests, and will continue to rest, in consequence of the stand taken at Syracuse, in the popular mind under that imputation. The fine distinctions and impotent efforts with which it may try to disprove the charge will be of no avail. The public will not concern itself materially with these, but will decide according to the general impression which the party tends to give. It is for this reason that he will find a majority of the better class of liberals, who do not wish to occupy an ambiguous relation to the subject which his league has made uppermost, unwilling to enlist under his banner.

Apart from the principal point discussed above, we must respectfully claim some acquaintance with the antecedents and principles of the League no less than himself. We have taken an active interest in it from the start. We were present at two out of the three Annual Congresses which it has held, which, we believe, is just two more than he has attended, as it was also true of the larger number of those who were most active in forcing the issue upon the League at Syracuse, and are now at the head of the party which captured it.

Furthermore, we were at Syracuse, and he was not, and are very sure we know much better for this reason who were there and what was done there than he does.

Mr. Wright implies that the split at Syracuse was a mere matter of a majority vote, and hence that its seceding members could not justify their action; and this specious fallacy has been assiduously and cunningly put forth ever since. Nothing could be more unjust nor more preposterous on the face of it. Does not Mr. Wright know enough about public assemblies to tell him that majorities in such cases are often dishonorable and unfair ones? It would seem that his anti-slavery experience should have taught him this. Let him look over the list of the men and women who left the Congress at Syracuse, and signed the protest against its proceedings, and see if he thinks they are persons who would be likely to desert a cause simply because they were legitimately out-voted.

We think Mr. Wright overestimates the value and promise of the Leagues which are now forming, as he says, under the shibboleth of repeal. He will find that when the actual circumstances out of which that party came into existence and the principles and aims of those who are mainly shaping its course are understood, there will be a cooling of sympathy, and a lessening of support which has been, under the influence of misapprehension in some instances, innocently rendered. We think he will find that fine moral sensibility and strong moral sentiment gravitate to that which the prevailing instincts and intelligence of society pronounce the clear and unmistakable position in respect to the question.

Mr. Wright thinks we put the case too strong when we aver the League has suffered "disrepute and demoralization" in consequence of the Syracuse division. Let us quote just here from a letter received a few days since, July 9th, from one of the most vigorous and influential centres of liberalism in the West, to show him how others feel about this:—

"Our Liberal League is in a dormant condition just now. We have not had a business meeting since the battle of Syracuse; the proceedings of that convention had the effect of a paralytic stroke upon our society, alienating the good wishes of many from us who had been our supporters in spirit before, and giving color to the reports put in circulation by the 'unco guild' that we were a band of free-lovers and fanatics. Before that time the League was growing in popularity and its principles were becoming known; since that time it has gained little and lost much. A melancholy day it was when the Liberal League movement in America struck hands with free-lovism and hoisted the motto 'Liberty and Obscenity, one and inseparable.' I think our members are all of one mind as to what course it is our duty to pursue, and I think a dissolution of our connection with the old organization, and an acceptance of the invitation extended by the new, will be the result of our first meeting."

If, on a consideration of such facts as the foregoing, and an abundance of correspondent ones that might be adduced, Mr. Wright can still seriously entertain the idea that there is any prospect of the union of the two Leagues which he suggests, then we can only say that we shall be forced to relinquish the views of his mental characteristics we have been accustomed to hold, and must regard him as a person of more credulity and less intelligence than we have hitherto supposed.

PROGRESSIVE FRIENDS.

The annual meeting, this year the twenty-seventh, of the Progressive Friends of Pennsylvania occurred at the usual place early in June, and continued three days. It was well attended, and by those present was felt to be an interesting, a very profitable, meeting, not below, in this respect, those held in former years.

These people who assemble at Longwood year by year seek to be sons of the spirit, yielding freely to the great law of growth and progress, keeping their faces towards the dawn to catch the opening sunlight as it shall arise to the world. The discussions were occupied with themes of high practical interest, and although they must be, in a meeting that attempts to touch upon so many themes, very partial and incomplete, yet they indicate to a stranger coming in among them how much force there is lying latent in what is called in the churches the lay element, and that remains to be used, I doubt not very effectively in the future, in the work of broad, universal religion. We had this element pretty largely represented in the deliberations at Longwood, and some of our best statements came from persons who doubtless have never been accustomed to speak from platforms. That is one very good feature in these meetings,—one doubtless that comes in a degree from the Quaker ancestry that Longwood owns.

Impressive testimonies were adopted in reference to several names that within the year have passed away, all known to the meeting and identified in greater or less degree with its objects. These were William Lloyd Garrison, who several times had been present and spoken; Bayard Taylor, a native of Chester County and her most eminent son; George Thompson and Chandler Darlington, this last an old and life-long friend, deeply devoted from the beginning to all its interests. Rev. Joseph May, of Philadelphia, read an admirable memorial discourse upon Mr. Garrison.

Mr. May, as is well known, is a son of the late Rev. Samuel J. May, who was a life-long friend and earnest coadjutor of Garrison from the beginning. It seemed fitting that such a tribute should come from the son of such a sire. The discourse has been published in one of the newspapers of Philadelphia, and deserves, as I hope it will receive, a wide circulation. It will also be given in the Proceedings, now just about to be issued, of the meeting. Mr. Oliver Johnson of New York, Rev. N. A. Hascall of Vineland, Mr. H. S. Kent of Westchester, and Mr. Willbur, editor of the Vineland Independent (if I will use the name of the paper right), were present, and contributed much to the interest and value of the occasion.

I enclose a copy of the testimony adopted upon religion and morality, from which it will be seen that this meeting puts itself on record plainly in regard to two, certainly, of the fundamental and living questions of the hour:—

"Recognizing the fact that the religious sentiment is the deepest of all the sentiments implanted in the bosom of our nature, its intuitions and convictions the most sacred trust committed to man, we cherish with profoundest interest all that pertains to its right cultivation and just direction and expression. As rightly or wrongly interpreted, it is either the most precious boon and benign blessing, or source of the direst injury and calamity known to the human race.

"Profoundly believing, as we do, that religion is becoming in our time increasingly emancipated, broadened, and freed, dissociated from dogma and acceptance of book, institution, or observance as embodying and prescribing its essential elements, we rejoice in the firm conviction that it is to become more and more clearly seen to be one with the simple, plain worship of truth and beauty, the constant endeavor of the soul after all knowledge and wisdom and excellence.

"We believe that, thus interpreted, it opens the largest and richest field for the spiritual growth and culture of man, individually, socially, and we commend its study and appropriation in this breadth to all liberals as an object worthy their best attention, and especially we urge its sedulous inculcation by them, on all fit opportunities, in the minds of the young.

"We do moreover at this time renew our earnest testimony in behalf of the superlative claims of the primal moralities,—moralities as expressed in the law of virtue, chastity, self-restraint, and purity in the life,—and we deeply deprecate and emphatically condemn, under whatever pretext or persuasion it may be sought, any attempt to loosen the hold or weaken the sway of these in the general mind, as criminally harmful, directly subversive in tendency and sure effect, wherever it may succeed, of the very foundations of moral order and the life of society itself."

HARVARD AND BUSSEY COLLEGE.

The daily papers for the last few weeks have been largely filled with reports of college commencement exercises in various parts of the country. Of course it is impossible to read them all, although they are generally cheerful reading as representing our institutions of learning in most prosperous condition. But our interest mainly centred in our great university which has been the pride and boast of Massachusetts for over two hundred years, and about which the public seem to be asking some questions which we hoped its very plain-spoken president would satisfactorily answer. Of two of these we will say a word. The first concerns the department of the college located in West Roxbury. Perhaps it is not universally known that a large bequest was made by Mr. Bussey, who was himself a workingman, never ashamed of his humble origin, to found a school for "Agricultural and Industrial Education." The bequest was to take effect only after the death of certain members of his family. By an arrangement with the surviving members, however, a large portion of the estate was given over to the trustees of Harvard University—the appointed guardians of the trust—about eight years ago. It is one of the most beautiful places in the vicinity of Boston, with every advantage of easy communication with the city. As the question of industrial education had been long considered one of the most interesting and important in our social progress, great interest was felt in the opening of a school so richly endowed, to be managed by the highest institution of learning in the country. President Eliot informs us that after eight years it has graduated one pupil, but complacently adds that Bussey College "has a future before it." We trust it may have; but if this be its present, it would seem that its future should be under somewhat different auspices. It has always been a puzzle to the friends of co-education, where President Eliot found the facts on which he based his statements of its failure. They have looked abroad too far: they should have inquired at Bussey College. At its first opening it was announced that the class in horticulture would be opened to women, and on the strength of the hope for "the future of Bussey," a special Horticultural School for Women was abandoned. Its first class was mainly, if not entirely, composed of the pupils of that school. Was it this fact which has kept pupils away from the college? We remember an amusing incident which occurred in regard to one of the other classes. Some ladies interested in the subject drove up to Bussey, and, finding that the lecture of the afternoon was to be on the horse, asked permission to attend it. The gentlemanly professor informed them that the class was not open to ladies, but before the hour of the lecture courteously showed them about the grounds. The hour and the lecturer came, but no pupils. The accomplished professor, evidently anxious not to waste the time, devoted it to a very interesting talk on his subject, and then inspected the lady's horse and gave her excellent advice as to some ailment of the animal. This was certainly good practical teaching, but it was the wrong pupils.

Seriously, the public are much concerned to know how this property is used, and why such arrangements have not been made and such advantages offered as would draw pupils to the college. Theodore Parker used to say "that he never heard the grass complain that the cows would not eat it"; and if there had been an earnest purpose to meet the wants of the community by giving good, practical, available instruction in agriculture and other industrial branches, we should be glad to know why it has failed of success. This, President Eliot did not tell us, but seemed to think his one graduate rather an excellent joke.

But there is a still deeper question which we should like to have answered. It is currently reported that the state of morals at Harvard University is exceptionally low; that two of the most dangerous vices that beset civilization prevail there to an alarming extent; that the theatres which give the coarsest and most indecent exhibitions rely upon its students for their patronage; and that some of the worst features of such exhibitions are repeated within its walls. It is also said that the government of the college do not feel any responsibility for this state of things, but take the position that each individual pupil is the guardian of his own morality.

When we remember that on the Board of Trustees are such honored names as those of R. W. Emerson and James Freeman Clarke, we can hardly believe that these statements are true to their full extent.

That the subject is a difficult one, all will admit; but that it should receive some consideration, and that the public should have some assurance that the effort of the government is to keep up the moral standard of the college to a level with its literary reputation, seems to us no more than parents who are to trust their sons there for four of the most important years of their life have a right to ask.

We speak of the dangers of a public-school education without corresponding moral influence; but the higher the school, the wider its influence. Harvard is to give us, to a great degree, our teachers, our clergymen, our lawyers, our physicians, our statesmen. Is it a matter of indifference to the public whether for four years they have breathed an atmosphere of bracing, purifying moral power, or a poisonous malarial which will produce evil that is constantly propagating itself?

We all feel a common pride in the great men who look back to Harvard as their Alma Mater; we know what wisdom and virtue have been nourished there. We do ask an assurance that the future is not to belie the past, and that it is to carry out the purpose for which it was founded, which was to make Learning the handmaid of Truth and Righteousness.

"HERE INDIVIDUALISM."

THE INDEX of July 8d says editorially: "It was the dream of Mr. Abbot that the Liberal League movement might eventually become the rationalistic church of the future." I should be sorry to think Mr. Abbot had such a thought, even in his sleep. If he had such a thought in his waking moments, it may account for what has happened to the League. The "church" idea is that of segregating the wheat of the world from the tares, which, curiously enough, according to the record, was pointedly condemned by the person whom every Christian church claims as its founder. If I had any comprehension of Mr. Abbot's meaning, for the first two years of the League movement, or of its Constitution, he sought to embody, not only rationalists, but citizens of all religions and none, for the special purpose of completely secularizing the State and securing to every individual the rights of conscience, involving the full rights of the churches within their proper spheres. So far from being a "rationalistic church," the Liberal League, as Mr. Abbot nobly planned it, was a movement even more in the interest of Christianity than of Infidelity or Rationalism, inasmuch as the latter must necessarily grow faster while the former is to a certain extent both a State pauper and a State controller. For Christian ecclesiasticism, in this age and country, as all intelligent Christians must see, the best if not the only chance of life is in entire independence of the State. Such Christians would gladly vote for the just taxation of church property, and would, of course, welcome rational or infidel votes to the same effect. A sincere Calvinist or Hopkinsonian has a far stronger reason or motive to join the League than an infidel or rationalist. And a Roman Catholic has the strongest of all. Cavour was a sincere and devoted Catholic, and what he began to do for Italy is all that Mr. Abbot's League aims to do for the United States. Turning such a movement into a rationalistic church is simply backing out at the little end of the horn.

Rationalists have no quarrel with churches that do not attempt to play the parasite or the dictator in regard to the State. They claim the right to speak as they think, not to dictate what others shall think or speak. Till they part with reason they will not think of organizing churches, but will be content to take a part in any movement to promote the common happiness of mankind, without minding who joins it; and they will stay in it till its charity becomes a rarity.

I think Mr. Abbot, in founding the League, builded a good deal better than he knew. The credit due him is altogether too great to be wiped out by any subsequent mistake; and I think the mistake he made was creditable to his sincerity if not to his judgment and statesmanship. He lacked the generalship of the lion going to war, and failed to understand the cunning tactics of the enemy. His bold stroke of organizing the National Liberal League in Philadelphia in 1876 was a salutary warning to those who were attempting to inoculate the Federal Constitution with the dogmas of Christian theology. It caused them to change their tactics and attack the freedom of the press, under the pretence of merely attacking that intolerable licentiousness which in our age and country is always clandestine. Unfortunately, by this sham and hollow pretence, Mr. Abbot, as well as many other excellent liberals, was deceived; he failed to see, what time is rapidly demonstrating, that the boasted and frightfully overrated work of the Christian Society for the Suppression of Vice, in the destruction of obscene publications, was merely preparatory to "stamping out" THE INDEX and all other rational publications.

Sad as the facts are, I cannot quite agree with the acting editor of THE INDEX when he says: "But the Liberal League, it may as well be confessed with sadness, has suffered such demoralization and disrepute in consequence of events of its last Congress that for the larger number of its founders, and a very considerable one of radicals in general, it has well-nigh ceased to be."

How this can be true, when Auxiliary Liberal Leagues have been organizing since the last Congress more rapidly than ever before, is not easy to see. The "disrepute" of the League cannot have increased much, for in the eyes of the Christian world nothing, not even loose notions of marriage and divorce, is so disreputable as infidelity,—and the League was always stigmatized as an association of infidels, though it has always contained some excellent Christians. As to the "demoralization," the League at its last Congress was unanimously in favor of proper laws for the punishment of obscenity, and it was unanimously opposed to the present Act of Congress which professes to have that object. The only difference was, that one part of the delegates, which happened to be a majority, was in favor of the repeal of that Act, and the other was in favor of having it amended; and almost unanimously the Congress voted to leave that question open for the next Congress. Thus far, surely, there is no "demoralization." If the old officers had been elected, there would have been none. Unfortunately they were not. And because they were not, a considerable number of delegates withdrew and formed another National League, which differs from the original one in no principle or aim whatever, but only in persons. There is not, so far as I can see, the shadow of a reason why the two organizations should not reunite, if the League was not a mistake from the first. Neither will gain, in either reputation or strength, by standing apart from the other. Either of them can challenge comparison, in point of morals of life and literature with any Christian sect or political party, and has no reason, in seeking by every lawful means what is self-evidently righteous, to feel disquieted at the taunts or the lies of parasites, inquisitors, and persecutors. Such are by no means a majority of the people. The League has only to persevere unflinchingly on the straight line of its constitution, and a majority of the people of America will adopt and act on its self-evident truth.

E. W.

THE TWO LAST social meetings of Sorosis were very delightful. That of May was devoted to art, and illustrated by a variety of engravings, etchings, and paintings of ancient and modern artists, with explanatory papers from various members. This committee is under the charge of Miss Burt, who has studied several years in Munich. The meeting in June was the occasion of the presentation of a beautiful basket of flowers by the present to the former president, Mrs. Charlotte B. Wilbour, who has just returned from an extended residence abroad. Both ladies made brief but happy speeches. Then, after original poems and essays, Mrs. Winterburn, the chairman on music, gave a most delightful parlor concert. Miss Beebe and Miss Harvey from the Royal Academy, London, sang, and there were duets and solos upon the violin, harp, and piano. All this feast of good things closed by a discussion upon philanthropy as applied to the Indian.—Religio-Philosophical Journal, June 28.

OVER-POPULATION.

It would seem as if in a country like this, where unreclaimed Nature is still in the ascendant, and only a portion of the old Atlantic seaboard States have been enough humanized to make man and his modifying influence on Nature at all impressive features,—it would seem, we say, as if even the great cities and towns of a country still so largely in a wilderness condition should be free from immense filthy areas of crowded, squalid tenement barracks, and noisome, pestiferous alleys and streets, the haunts and seminaries of poverty, crime, and disease, where even vice is so repulsive as to lose its usual attractions, and where humanity is packed almost as densely in fetid apartments as it used to be in the holds of slavers. It would seem as if our Anglo-Saxon jealousy of State interference should have yielded to the necessities of the case, and the government, federal or local, have exercised a coercive but kindly and paternal supervision over the movements of the poorer class of immigrants. But the cupidity of employers and landlords and their own shiftlessness and gregariousness have been left from the start to mass this sort of population in ever-increasing multitudes in our great cities, the low quarters of which lack none of the repulsive details of wretchedness which Dickens could describe so graphically. How brilliant is the atmosphere of New York, and what sparkling, swift-flowing currents of salt and fresh water lave it! What business has this comparatively youthful though gigantic metropolis to be reproducing, on such a glorious environment of air, earth, and water, the hideous proletarian squalor, wretchedness, and crime of London? Intelligent European immigrants with means, of course have a definite objective point when they cross the ocean, and know where they are going to alight. This class has never contributed to choke up our cities. They proceed to their destinations at once. But the mass of immigrants has been of unintelligent peasants unused to the ownership of land or anything else, and far more in need of being made the wards of the government than the Indians. These of course have depended on finding employment as common laborers. They have had neither the means nor the enterprise to make themselves successful colonists of a new soil; hence they have loitered about the great cities looking for a job, or crowded into our manufacturing towns here in New England, exchanging for their thousand-acre landlords at home the great mill-owners here. This class of immigrants, even those of them who are thrifty enough to amass money (and there are multitudes of such), exhibit only an occasional and exceptional tendency to become real settlers on and cultivators of the soil. They seem to prefer to live en masse in the shadow of their churches and of the mills rather than to establish themselves on isolated farms. The Celt is gregarious to the last degree. Individually he seems to lack confidence in himself, and also to lack initiative. He does everything en masse. He does not recognize either the need or right of private judgments, but is swayed by a sameness and unchangeableness of belief and opinion which keep him stationary, and the slave of custom and tradition even amid populations full of movement and the modern spirit. In short, the Celt is a noun of multitude and believes in the numerical principle, or that numbers make strength; and they do in an attack on a solitary policeman. How different is the Anglo-Saxon with his arrogant individuality and perfect self-reliance. He wants room and ample margin. He does not go with the crowd, but has a way and opinion of his own which he will back against the world.

The original settlers and colonists of American soil, of Massachusetts and Virginia and Georgia and the Carolinas, did not settle en masse to keep each other company. They overspread a wide extent of territory and rejoiced in their large acreage, independence, and isolation. The people of Virginia wanted no large cities. They preferred a sparsely-settled territory, so that each citizen might have ample elbow-room. The doctrine of State rights and perfect local independence is a genuine Anglo-Saxon principle, or rather a Teutonic principle. The Teutonic people never would, when left to their own impulses, surrender their personal independence, their individuality, to Church or State. Latin and Celtic populations have always, up to a quite recent date, been willing to merge theirs in centralizing institutions. A great industrial system demands a dense and crowded population of a miscellaneous character. Cheap and plentiful labor is its great desideratum. A long period of commercial prosperity, when Napoleon's Berlin decrees gave us the carrying trade of Europe, gave to the founders of our New England manufacturing system ample means to build mills and utilize the water-power of our streams and lakes. But it was evident from the start that the population of New England was neither numerous enough nor of a description to answer the purposes of great incorporated manufacturers. They wanted what is called a proletariat, and they imported it. We believe that our industrial system was a forced system from the start, and not a case of spontaneity or natural outgrowth. It has in the course of half a century Europeanized New England; that is, reduced us socially if not politically to the condition of a European community. The population is now divisible into two classes, viz., capitalists and hirelings, exhibiting those extremes of wealth and poverty which our old-fashioned, independent yeomanry knew nothing about. Our Lowells and Fall Rivers and Lawrences are not yet so populous and turbulent as Manchester and Glasgow and Lyons, but will be, sooner or later, for they will continue to be the industrial cities of the country.

As far as they have got, they are pretty much of the same description as those great European centres of industrialism. Wouldn't it have been better for us to have fed the swarming populations of those centres, and have suffered them to do the spinning and weaving for us? Mr. Atkinson will doubtless answer emphatically, No. At any rate, the nabobs of the Boston of the early part of this century and the cities of Essex coast, who had become needlessly rich through the carrying trade and privateering, must have an outlet for their spare cash; and so Lowell was built, to begin with. And it must be confessed that our manufacturing system has become a success in every way, even in competition with the gigantic industrialism of England. With it the Federal government was able to equip its vast armies during the war. By means of it Massachusetts, so insignificant territorially, is one of the mightiest in the sisterhood of States, and even little seven-by-nine Rhode Island is formidable in wealth and resources. Even England, begins to feel the sceptre escaping from her grasp. It has kept sterile New England abreast of New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, and will continue to keep her abreast of the most flourishing sections of the country. The great objection to the industrial system is, that it packs people too close and demoralizes them by too much contact, and robs them of enterprise and self-helpfulness by habituating them to look to others for employment. A sovereign citizen would work for himself and put the profits of his labor in his own pocket. All industries are now carried on by rich corporations or rich private capitalists. Individual enterprise is dwarfed, and the rich are ever growing richer and the poor poorer, as they are in England. In short, the individual withers and incorporated capital is more and more. B. W. BALL.

"The weary Titan, with deaf ears and labor-dimmed eyes,"

COMPULSORY VACCINATION.

In THE INDEX of July 3, under the caption "Should we be Compelled to Poison our Children?" "E. J. L." quotes numerous protests against compulsory vaccination, based on the two grounds that the operation is inefficient as a preventive of smallpox, and that it involves a grave danger of communicating other diseases. Despite a few medical names among the writers cited, it is certain that the greatly preponderant weight of authority is opposed to both these positions, with respect to cases where the vaccine virus is properly selected, properly kept, and properly introduced.

That contamination has often occurred from virus originally impure or imperfectly preserved, or from uncleaned instruments, my own observation of the effects of wholesale public vaccination can unfortunately attest. And a law cannot be too strongly condemned which enforces such an operation without providing in the strictest manner against all such sources of danger. But the danger can be wholly averted, since it has become practicable to secure an indefinite supply of pure and fresh virus direct from the heifer. I think public vaccinators should be allowed to use no other, for the risk in collecting the humanized virus on a large scale is considerable, even with extraordinary care; and this is not likely to be exercised by those whose profits depend on the amount obtained.

The prophylactic value of vaccination, properly done, is well established by more than eighty years' experience; and now that it can be rendered perfectly safe, the right and the duty of the government are clear. For the protection of the whole community, the State must demand that no individual be left liable to become a centre of infection for a disease which, until the days of Jenner, was one of the most loathsome and most fatal scourges of the race.

THE QUESTION STILL OPEN.

BOSTON, Mass., July 8.

MR. EDITOR:—

I think that Mr. E. L. Crane's question in his article entitled "Is Mind Matter?" can be disposed of with the utmost ease, and as follows: He says, "The question is, On what was the remembered impression made? On matter, such as bones, nerves, flesh, blood, etc? All these things since that time have many times passed away and been renewed; not a vestige of the matter then forming my body remains. Yet I am conscious that that upon which the impression was then made still remains. What is it which still remains? Materialists, can you give us a little light on this phenomenon?"

Now, as impressions made upon the flesh, such as wounds for instance, will leave scars that never disappear, no matter how many times the said flesh may be wholly renewed in the economy of Nature, therefore I can see no difficulty in supposing that impressions upon the mind may be retained in a somewhat similar manner, and so, no matter how many times the whole of the mental faculties may be renewed, the old impressions will always remain, just as is the case with the scars upon other parts of the body.

GEORGE NATHAN HILL.

WHAT IS INSANITY?

The difference in the character of men is merely difference of nerve force; difference in its power and direction. Although it receives an inclination before birth, it is yet subject to modification by culture, whether it be deliberate culture or accidental. As this is the true definition both of character and insanity, it is unphilosophical to say that any man is insane or is not insane. That which to the popular apprehension is insanity is simply excess of force in some one direction; excess beyond that of the average man. That excess is quite as likely to be in the direction of so-called virtue as vice, attributes not absolute, as generally supposed, but simply relative, as the positive and negative of galvanism. The idea of freedom from insanity is an absurdity. I know of no sight that impresses me with a deeper sense of its silliness than twelve men profoundly pronouncing another man sane. The brain of the Pomeroy boy and that of the Pocasset fanatic and other religious monomaniacs, also that of the Holyoke murderer of his three little girls, is doubtless free from morbidity; yet they will not be hung, because the truth is gradually dawning upon the progressive intellect of men that the doctrine of absolute moral responsibility cannot be maintained; that we must yield our common prejudices and accept the true philosophy, as summed up in the Scriptural injunction, "Judge not."

CAUSALITY.

MR. W. F. JAMISON is announced as one of the speakers at the Spiritualist camp-meeting which is to be held at Lansing, Mich., from July 26 to August 4.

LEWIS G. JAMES, whose able and erudite essay appeared in THE INDEX of last week, contributes some interesting reminiscences to the Commonwealth of Mr. Garrison.

PROF. FELIX ADLER made a visit to Fall River, to obtain personal knowledge of the situation there, while passing through this city on his way to the Adirondacks lately.

THE ANNUAL REPORT for the current year on "Art and Literature," before the New England Woman's Club, was read by its author, Mrs. E. D. Cheney, at its meeting, a few days since.

MR. UNDERWOOD's appointments when last heard from were Monmouth, Ill., July 11 and 12; White Hall, Ill., July 13; Conotton, Leesville, and Scio, Ohio, July 16, 17, 18; Paris, Ohio, July 19 and 20; Altoona, Pa., July 21; Middletown, N.Y., July 23, 24, 25.

AN INFLUENTIAL committee has been chosen to procure a portrait of the eminent scientist Dr. W. B. Carpenter, for the London University. The services of Dr. Carpenter, says Nature, to science and to the London University are so well known that we are confident the proposal will meet with a satisfactory response. Earl Graaiville is chairman of the committee, which includes the names of Sir John Lubbock, Dr. William Smith, and others of corresponding prominence.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, accompanied by his two daughters and servants, reached Boston Thursday, July 10. The party came on the "City of Portland," from St. John, N.B. They were greeted with the dipping of flags and friendly salutes as they came up the harbor, and quite a crowd awaited on the wharf their landing. The Duke was the recipient of much attention during his brief stay in the city, from prominent persons. He left on Saturday for Newport, where he will remain until the 14th, and expects to leave New York on the 18th for Liverpool.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Commonwealth, in giving an account of the meetings of the "Boston Section of the Socialistic Party," pays this tribute to a well-known philanthropist: "Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, of New York, whose sympathies are as broad as humanity, and whose purse seems always open to every worthy public object—more especially to the cause of reform—and whose heart and personal service are devoted to the cause of the working classes, has extended her sympathy and help to the support of these educational debates. A week or two ago, her intention of being present on one of these occasions having been defeated by the sickness of a distant friend, she generously sent the handsome donation of twenty-five dollars to the funds of the 'section'; and now I understand she has made the hall virtually rent free on Saturday evenings for a year to come. All honor to her, for she has by no means identified herself with the ideas and aims of socialism in thus showing practically her desire to aid in their fullest expression."

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." and later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with 'increasing interest.'"

THE INDEX aims—
 To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.
 The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

- SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.
- SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.
- SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.
- SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the Editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

SIFTINGS.

THE ENGLISH freethinkers anticipate a fresh impulse to their cause from the influence of Talmage's preaching.

A RECENT LAW of Michigan declares civil offices vacant if the incumbents become intoxicated, and provides for the filling of such vacancies without delay.

"A MAN WHO uses his balmorals to tread on your toes with much frequency and an unmistakable emphasis may prove a fast friend in adversity; but meanwhile your adversity has not arrived and your toes are tender."—Theophrastus Such.

IN HIS YOUTH Schiller learned to play upon the harp. A neighbor who disliked it once said to him, "Herr Schiller, you play like David, only not so finely." "And you," quickly replied Schiller, "speak like Solomon, only not so wisely."

AS AN ILLUSTRATION of the excited state of feeling at the recent trial of Prof. Robertson Smith in Scotland for heresy, it is related that when he rose to speak in his own defence a member of the court shouted to him, "If I had a Jenny Geddes stool you wouldn't stand there long."

SOME OF THE good people of Philadelphia have provided an ice-water fountain in Independence Square, where it is said from ten to twelve thousand persons stop daily to "take a drink." It is a cool way of treating them, but we presume it will be considered wholly justifiable under the circumstances.

WHEN VICTOR EMANUEL took possession of Rome he left the Roman observatory in the hands of the late Father Secchi, out of respect to his exceptional merits. When Father Secchi died, the Pope appointed his successor, who took possession of the establishment and refused to leave the place. He has been expelled however, manu militari.

A POLICE JUSTICE in Brooklyn, N.Y., a few days since imposed a fine of fifteen dollars upon a man for insulting a Chinaman, remarking that a Chinaman has the same right as a white man to the protection of the law. It looks as though that justice must have had some acquaintance with the Declaration of American Independence, which is not always apparent in such instances.

I AM CONVINCED that the readiest way to break the sorcery powers of bigotry is a general coöperation in measures of radical reform and practical righteousness, having in view the happiness and welfare of the people; neither lingering in the past nor concerning ourselves greatly of the distant future, but acting in "the living present," looking at its needs, and nobly discharging its responsibilities and duties. —Wm. Lloyd Garrison.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "Could you name any book that treats on the best method of teaching natural morality and how to think for one's self? I have a boy eight years old, and I want to do my duty by him; still I believe, like Stephen Girard, that a child's mind should not be poisoned by religious dogmas till he is old enough to choose and think for himself. When that time arrives I shall leave him free to act for himself."

WHO CAN DOUBT that virtue is sure of its reward. Mrs. Sarah A. Dorsey, who died recently in New Orleans, is reported to have bequeathed to the chief of the late confederacy, Jefferson Davis, her entire estate, which includes two large plantations in the upper part of Mississippi and an elegant villa at Beauvoir on the sea-coast. It is safe to conclude that Mrs. Dorsey was one of the unreconstructed women to whom Jefferson proudly alluded in one of his late speeches.

MR. GLADSTONE has written to a correspondent of church matters as follows: "I find a principal test of religion in its power of securing right moral judgments, and to my great pain and disappointment I have found during the last three years that thousands of churchmen, not including the clergy, supplied the great mass of those who have gone lamentably wrong upon questions involving deeply the interests of truth, justice, and humanity. I should hear with much comfort any satisfactory explanation of this painful circumstance."

IT WOULD SEEM as though no analyses of the distinctive traits of our legislative bodies could do them justice that should leave out of account their unconscionable penchant for stealing. It is not peculiar to any special class of these departments of the government, but is characteristic of the national, State, and municipal alike. It has been discovered, for example, that the legislature of Pennsylvania, under the leadership of W. N. Kemble, a bank president, made an effort to subsidize a railroad corporation to the amount of some millions of dollars.

THERE ARE OVER fifty kindergartens in St. Louis, we are told, with between four and five thousand children in them. The kindergarten is compulsory (and no charge for school material enforced) in so far that children under seven and a half, if sent to a primary school, must spend half the school day in a kindergarten unless they have previously been in one for two years. Already the kindergarten songs have to a large extent replaced the silly rigmaroles that the children used to sing when together. There are those who claim that the kindergarten will make a model city of St. Louis.

THE REV. MR. MALLOCK, a distinguished English clergyman and essayist, is in an uncomfortable frame of mind. Everything is going wrong he thinks. Science, philosophy, materialism, and such things, are withering and destroying all the high inspirations of human existence, the charm and beauty of the planet. Mr. Mallock in view of these things asks the doleful question, "Is life worth living?" and reaches the summary conclusion that an affirmative answer is possible only on condition it is spent in the Roman Catholic Church. But if this is the only alternative that can be offered, there is reason to believe there will be those who will raise another question: "Is life worth living on such terms?"

THE REV. GILBERT HAVEN, D.D., is a Methodist bishop. Unfortunately Methodist bishops, though doubtless very good men, are not always the wisest in the world. Bishop Haven, we presume, is a good man, but those who are familiar with his public career must have noticed that he does not appear to be a remarkably strong or broad one intellectually when he attempts to discuss themes outside of the ordinary routine of Methodism pure and simple. Mr. Haven very obviously indicated this at Woodstock the other day, as one of Mr. Bowen's Fourth of July orators. We give a specimen of his deliverances on that occasion, which shows how he appears when the subject under consideration calls for philosophic intelligence instead of preaching. Under division 3d of his oration he says, "The last duty I shall mention as preparative to making the United States of America the nation of America is the more definite Christianization of the Constitution. This country is not to spread over this continent except by the will of God. It is only in and through Christ that it can grow and prevail. It is as a Christian republic alone that it can cover the continent. . . . What our fathers meant to do we must do. We must place Christ on the Constitution, and the cross on our banner. How gloriously would that flag wave if amid its heavenly stars should shine forth the more heavenly cross!" and much more to the same effect. The fervid bishop has spent his years to but little account, so far as a knowledge of the American people is concerned, if he supposes in a country composed of such heterogeneous elements in respect to religion as ours such a union of religion and the State as he proposes is practicable or would subserve the general harmony and welfare.

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N. Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The Priests of the Sun.

A LECTURE DELIVERED BEFORE THE LIBERAL SOCIETY OF ALBANY, N. Y., AT THE MARTIN OPERA HOUSE, SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 27, 1879.

BY HON. E. P. HURLBUT.

A traveller once visited Little Pedlington, and was left with his heavy trunk at the end of his route, some distance from any hotel. He inquired anxiously for a porter or guide, and was informed that if "Blind Bob" came there he would do the needful for him. After a while this character appeared. "Blind!" exclaimed the traveller; "under such circumstances you have chosen a strange profession!" To which the blind guide replied, "We can't choose what we like in this world, sir. If I weren't blind, I'd never have chose to get my living by being a guide,—that I promise you!"

It is written that when the blind lead the blind they both fall into the ditch; and this has been verified by the history of the priesthood of all ages. Intellectually, every man is born blind, with nothing but the capacity to become enlightened. He is a pupil from the cradle to the grave. He receives his first lessons from the organs of vision, and what impresses him earliest and with greatest force are the light and the objects it reveals for his contemplation. The sun receives his first attention, as it does his latest, being a great effulgence, a mighty power, the chief object of his wonder and his awe. From it proceed light and heat, and so far as man can observe, the primary cause of the development of organization, vegetable and animal life. He feels the influence of the sun's "sovereign vital lamp," and exclaims with Milton,—

"Hail! holy Light, offspring of heaven, first-born,
Or of the eternal co-eternal beam,
May I express thee unblamed?—Since God is Light,
And never but in unapproached Light
Dwelt from eternity, dwelt then in thee,
Bright effluence of bright essence increate."

It was natural—nay, it was inevitable—that the first sense of religious awe and reverence should have been awakened by the sun; that the first religion should have been sun-worship, and the first religious teachers of mankind priests of the sun. The most approved mythologists concur in stating that divine honors to the sun and the adoration of fire were, in the early ages of human history, universal or nearly so; and, as a consequence, the names of the principal deities worshipped by the different nations signified in their languages the sun, solar fire, light, and heat. The Amonians, a very ancient people, styled fire, or the god of fire, Apha, which was contracted to Ptha, and by that name became the Egyptian Vulcan. The heathen names of divinities, Osiris, Serapis, Dionusius, Jupiter, Ammon, Apollo, Mithra, Jove, Saturn, Hercules, Molech, Adonis, Esculapius, and a host of others, all implied the sun, or solar manifestations.

For was the deity of the Israelites an exception. The Bible furnishes many instances in which the god of the Jews is represented by the brightness of the sun, or under the similitude of light or fire, as "the fire from heaven," as Job called the lightning, the "burning bush," a "pillar of fire," a "fiery flame," a "consuming fire," "cloven tongues of fire." Jehovah is represented as dwelling in light inaccessible, "who is clothed with light as with a garment," who "maketh his ministers a flaming fire." The word Iene, or Ie, or Jah of the Jews, was identical in meaning with the deus, Jupiter and Jove, of the Latins, and Mithra of the Persians. Jehovah was Iene, or Jah, and the latter was the sun.

It is not to be denied that there was a great diversity in the names ascribed to the same divinity, and in their modes of worship, by the different nations devoted to sun-religion; but there were at the same time so many features of resemblance in these diverse religions as to identify them as of one original, and to lead to the assumption that there existed in a very remote antiquity a large and powerful nation, from which there were emigrations in all directions to various parts of the earth, not excepting America. There is also reason to believe that these emigrants were led by their priests, and carried with them the customs, arts, traditions, and religion of the fatherland. Here was ample room for divergence in the course of time, according to the genius of the separate tribes of emigrants; but they all retained enough of their original customs and religion to prove a common origin.

Let us now take a survey of the state of sun-religion and its priesthood in the most remote antiquity, and we shall observe at the outset our sun-worshipping sojourners following their "Blind Bobs," who would never have set up for guides unless they had been blind, and we shall see what became of their victims.

Some colonies from Egypt and Canaan settled in Thrace, where they introduced fire and sun worship. They had a temple called Torone, also fire-towers on the sea-shore where priests and pilots lived together. In these towers and temples they habitually sacrificed strangers and shipwrecked mariners as offerings to the sun.

There was a place in Sicily called Tormen, where there was a Cyclopean temple, the priests of which were accused of feeding on the flesh of the persons sacrificed. When Saturn was accused of devouring his own children, the meaning was that the priests of his temple committed that outrage. At a temple of Dionusius (that is, the sun) they used to tear the flesh with their teeth from the living animal. This they did in honor of their god. In the island of Chios, and in Tenedos, Porphyry says it was a religious custom to tear a man limb from limb by way of sacrifice to Dionusius. From all which, says that most reliable Christian mythologist, Jacob Bryant, from whom I quote, "we may learn one sad truth: that there is scarcely anything so impious and unnatural as not at times to have prevailed" as a religion.

There were certain Lestrygonas, Lamias, and Cyclopeans in Sicily, composed of priests and priestesses of Leontini, who made their repasts upon the flesh of young children. These were the priests of Ham, another name for the sun. At Curium, one of the principal cities of Cyprus, similar customs prevailed. The city was named from Curo, the sun. The natives of this town made it a business to destroy all strangers and shipwrecked people, under the pretence of a religious rite.

Herodotus speaks of a temple of the sun remaining in his time, where no man entered who ever returned. The priests seized and sacrificed him. The victims were crowned with garlands, and then with great parade conducted to the altar. In some of these temples the priests were of great size and strength. Strangers were induced to engage in trials of strength with them,—to fight with them, in fact,—and were thus sacrificed.

Even in Egypt, it was said of Busiris "that he used to offer to Jupiter, as the most acceptable sacrifice, all the strangers whom chance brought into his country." One ancient priest of the sun was ambitious to be able to build a temple to Apollo (the sun) with the skulls of victims whom he slew. This custom of making a stranger who was to be sacrificed engage in a fight with a priest was carried to America, and the Spaniards found it among the Aztecs, as well as a temple built out of the skulls of human victims. These people were of the same grade of sun-worshippers as those we have described of the Old World, and their priests were of the same type. Our "Blind Bobs" so far, instead of helping the traveller along and guiding him to a safe destination, made victim and victims of him.

Phoenicia was one of the oldest, perhaps the very oldest nation known to authentic history. Its oldest city was Sidon; Tyre was colonized from it. The inhabitants of Sidon were originally nomads in Palestine, from whence they retired to build Sidon long before the Israelites occupied the former country. Their maritime position led them to embark in ship-building and commerce, and when the Jews entered Palestine Sidon was known as "the great city," "the first-born son of Canaan." Homer says it was distinguished above all cities for its manufactures. Twelve or fifteen hundred years before the Christian era, Sidon traded with distant countries and sent out colonies to Africa, to Egypt, and even to Ireland as is by some supposed. They made voyages of discovery and visited the British Isles for trade, and especially to procure tin.

Sanchoniathon, a Phoenician, a priest of Berytus, is supposed to have lived before the Trojan war. He wrote a treatise upon the Cosmogony and Theogony of the Phœnicians, embracing their history, and dedicated it to Abibal, king of his country; and it was esteemed by the latter and those commissioned to examine the work as historically true, as the author had taken what he advanced partly from the registers of particular towns, and partly from the archives preserved in the temples. This work has been destroyed by time, but it was extant at the commencement of our era, and we have extracts from it as quoted by the early Christian writers. Sanchoniathon lived four hundred years before Homer, and this work in addition to his Cosmogony, etc., contained the history of the primitive world before the deluge (although it did not contain an allusion to that event) down to some ages afterwards, embracing the history of his country. His Cosmogony is as follows:—

"The first principle of the Universe was a dark and spirituous air, a chaos full of confusion, and without light, eternal and of an endless duration. The spirit falling in love with its own principles (attraction) entered into close union with them, and this union was called Love. Hence sprang Mot or Mod, that is to say, either a slime, or rather an aqueous mixture, which was the seminal principle of all creatures and of the generation of the universe. The first animals were void of sensation; they engendered others endowed with intelligence, who were named Zophasemim,—that is, contemplators of the heavens.

"Immediately after Mot, the sun, the moon, and the stars, smaller and greater, began to appear and shine forth. The earth being strongly illuminated by the intense heat communicated to the earth and the seas, the winds were produced, with clouds that fell down in showers of rain; and the waters with which the earth had been overflown, being sucked up by the heat of the sun, were again united in the air, where, jostling against one another, they formed lightnings and thunder, which noise awakened the intelligent animals, and terrified them so that they began to stir in the earth and in the sea."

Sanchoniathon's Cosmogony dispenses with a God in the formation of the universe. He even says that the moving spirit had no knowledge of its own proper productions. It was unintelligent force, or "the great unconscious entity" of the Confucian Chinese.

Sanchoniathon, after accounting for the origin of the world, enters on the history of the first man and woman, whom, he said, found requisite nourishment in the fruit of trees. Their children dwelt in Phœnicia. In times of great drought they invoked the sun, whom they regarded as the sole god and sovereign of heaven, calling him Beelsamen, which in the Phœnician tongue signified lord of the heavens. So they were sun-worshippers, and the sun remained their only divinity until time developed men who became great benefactors of their race, by their invention in the arts or their feats in arms, when they became deified and received secondary divine honors.

One of these benefactors of his race among the Phœnicians was Thasutus, who first invented letters. This is the Thoth of the Egyptians and the Hermes of the Greeks. The inventor of the art of planting corn was Zeus Arotius, or Jupiter the Tiller. I cannot now go into further detail, but it appears to be true that the sun as chief divinity of the Phœnicians, and the lesser divinities which grew into position in the course of time in that country, were at length adopted in Egypt, carried there mainly by emigrants from Phœnicia. The sun was the Egyptian Osiris, and the moon was Isis; so the Egyptians were sun-worshippers, and their priests were priests of the sun.

"We may affirm in general," says Abbe Banier, "that there is no people whose religion is known to us, neither in our own continent nor that of America, that has not paid the sun religious worship, if we except some inhabitants of the torrid zone, who are continually cursing the sun for scorching them with his beams."

As we have carried the supreme god and the secondary divinities of Phœnicia to Egypt, let us follow them there, and notice how they fared with that imaginative and peculiar people.

The Egyptians were divided into four castes,—the sacerdotal, the peasants, the townsmen, and the common people. The priests were next to the king, who chose from among them his advisers, the judges, and the high officers of State. The priests were intimate associates of the monarch, his teachers as to his public duties, which they explained to him from their sacred books, and he was bound to follow their precepts as his guide. As they enjoyed the monopoly of the little science then known, which they kept secret from the vulgar, their influence was overwhelming; in a word, they ruled the State.

Our "Blind Bob" has now got one eye almost open, and these priests of the sun enjoyed a little light from the orb they worshipped,—enough at least to rule a kingdom, and to take excellent care of themselves. They had assigned to them one-third of all the lands of Egypt.

The priests of the sun at Heliopolis, as well as those of Thebes and Memphis, in the course of time became famous for their learning, and the sages of Greece repaired to these places to learn wisdom. Astronomy, which had so much to do with their religion, was studied at Heliopolis, where there was an observatory; and at one time Egypt led the ancient world in science, whose expounders were the priests of the sun. But their knowledge, however imperfect judged by modern standards, was kept for themselves or the few initiated into their mysteries, while the mass of the people were purposely kept in the profoundest ignorance, and amused or overawed by the most ridiculous superstitions.

Osiris was the great god of the Egyptians. He was the sun in a mist, if I may so speak, and so sacred that the priests scrupled to mention him. He was the sun personified, and was fabled to have once visited the earth, to have remained as a descended god for twenty-eight years, working wonders, and of whom there was a long fabulous history. As a deity he represented the divine goodness, and in his sacred office as an avatar, or manifestation of the deity on earth, he was superior to any of the great gods of Egypt. He was manifested on earth in a human form, but in what manner the priests kept as a profound mystery. "That was the humor of it." He was called "the manifest of good," and was said to have been "full of goodness (grace) and truth." "He appeared on earth to benefit mankind, and after having performed the duties he came to fulfil, and he had fallen a sacrifice to Typho, the Evil Principle, he rose again to a new life, and became the judge of mankind in a future state. The dead, also, after having passed their final ordeal and been absolved from sin, obtained in his name, which they then took, the blessings of eternal felicity." Osiris was styled "Lord of the World," "Lord of Life," "the Eternal Ruler," "King of the Gods."

In the future world, the office of Osiris was to judge the dead, and to rule over that kingdom "where the souls of good men enjoy eternal happiness."

Does not all this remind you of a certain other avatar, or descended god, whose existence on the earth was vouched at Jerusalem a long time after the fabled visit of Osiris? Had the religious fabulists of our era gained access to the fable of Osiris, and made a rehash of an old avatar to suit the genius of their times? Let us see. Osiris was persecuted unto death by the Evil Principle, and his tomb, unlike that of our avatar, is not a myth, but a sculptured fact visible at this day. Sir Gardner Wilkinson, whose accuracy no one doubts, and who is a Christian historian of Egypt, says:—

"At Philæ, where Osiris was particularly worshipped, and which was one of the places where they supposed him to have been buried, his mysterious history is curiously illustrated in the sculptures of a small retired chamber lying nearly over the western adytum of the temple. His death and removal from this world are there described; the number of twenty-eight lotus plants points out the period of years he was thought to have lived on earth, and his passage from this world to a future state is indicated by the usual attendance of the deities and genii who presided over the funeral rites of ordinary mortals. He is then represented with the feathered cap which he wore in his capacity of judge of Amenti; and this attribute shows the final office he held after his resurrection, and continued to exercise towards the dead at their last ordeal in a future state."

Surely in all this we have the substance of the history of our own avatar, long ages before he made his appearance. Our Christian historian, Sir Gardner Wilkinson, was struck with this, and rather than say it would seem that the latter avatar is but a renewal of the Egyptian, or that Jesus of Nazareth is but Osiris come again, he indulges in this lame and impotent conclusion. He says:—

"The existence of Osiris on earth was of course a speculative theory—an allegory—not altogether unlike the avatars of the Indian Vishnoo; and some may be disposed to think that the Egyptians, being aware of the promises of the real Saviour, had anticipated that event, recording it as though it had actually happened, and introducing the mystery into their religious system!"

To the impartial mind, it would seem rather that the Christians had introduced the Egyptian mysteries into their religious system. Reverse the hypothesis, Sir Gardner, and you may hit the truth. His supposition reminds one of a genius of our day who insisted that Shakespeare had borrowed one of his brightest thoughts from him! But it was the weakness of his case that gravelled Wilkinson; the fact in all probability being that, but for the ingenuity of the Egyptians in getting up an avatar, a descended god or saviour, we should have been entirely destitute of one, and that our Saviour is Osiris transplanted in Greece and Rome, with renewed myth and fable to suit the genius of the age. Instead, therefore, of exclaiming with Pope in his "Messiah," with holy rapture in view of the Christian avatar,—

"Oh! Spring to light, auspicious babe, be born!"

say rather, in view of his apparent outgrowth and development from the Egyptian divinity,—

Child of Osiris, suspicious offspring, avert!

The Greeks were a new people when Egypt was venerable with age, and borrowed largely from her. No Grecian led at home without having first travelled and studied in Egypt, and thus the science and religion of the latter were introduced in Greece. But the Grecians were vain, conceited, addicted to lies and fables, and transformed the mythology borrowed from Egypt so as almost to destroy its identity. But with sufficient labor we can trace their fables to an Egyptian original.

All the rites of the Greeks, their gods and heroes, were imported from the East, and chiefly from Egypt. Though they were unwilling to allow it, says Bryant, and that there never was a nation so incurious and indifferent to truth. It was a saying that the investigation of truth was too fatiguing for a Grecian. Bryant says that "the Greeks adopted all foreign history, and supposed it to have been of their own country. They mistook temples for deities, and places for persons. They changed every foreign term to something similar in their own language in sound, however remote in meaning, being led solely by the ear. They mistook titles for names, and from these titles multiplied their deities and heroes." Thus they did with the gods, heroes, and ceremonies of Egypt; and how much further they carried it I can not say, but it is a significant fact that the New Testament was originally written in Greek.

I will give one specimen of Greek capacity to invent and to distort facts. Diodorus Siculus says, "The [Greek] punishment of the wicked in Tartarus, the mansions of the blest in the Elysian fields, and some other such notions are evidently borrowed from the funeral rites of the Egyptians. Mercury, the conductor of souls among the Greeks, was formed on the model of a man to whom the Egyptians used to commit the care of Apis' dead body, to carry it to another who received it under a mask with three heads like those of Cerberus."

He further says, "The funeral ceremonies used in Egypt" at the time he wrote, "are conformable to all the Greeks wrote of the infernal regions,—such as the boat that transports the bodies (across the Nile); the piece of money that must be given to the ferryman, whose name is Charon in the Egyptian language; the temple of the gloomy Hecate, placed at the entrance of hell; the gates of Cocytus and Lethe, set upon brazen hinges; the other gates, which are those of Truth; the image of Justice without the head. Thus it is as to all the rest, which appear to be nothing but a copy of those funeral obsequies, such as they are actually performed in Egypt." The truth of Greek writers may be tested by this anecdote, related by Jacob Bryant: "Lysimachus had been an attendant upon Alexander during the whole series of his conquests in Asia; there had been nothing of moment transacted in the success of which he had not partaken. Yet even in his days, when he was King of Thrace, the accounts of those great actions had been so misrepresented that when a history of them was read in his presence they seemed quite new to him. 'It is all very fine,' says the prince, 'but where was I when all this happened?'" The Greeks, then, had the religion of the sun, with such embellishment of myth and fable as they had borrowed from the Egyptians or invented from their own fertile imaginations.

In Britain and Gaul, and probably in Germany, the priests of the sun were the Druids, who deserve a brief mention. Toland says it took sometimes twenty years' study to make a Druid; "and no wonder, since to arrive at perfection in sophistry requires a long habit, as well as in juggling, in which last they were very expert; but to be masters of both, and withal to learn the art of managing the mob, which is vulgarly called 'leading the people by the nose,' demands abundant study and exercise." Every Druid carried a wand or staff in his hand as a badge of his profession. He wore what is called a Druid's egg, encased in gold, hung about his neck. His hair was cropped short, while the people wore theirs long; but his beard was long, while the people shaved all of theirs but the upper lip. The Druids wore long habits with a white surplice when they performed the offices of religion. They had charge of the education of their time: kings and nobles were taught in their seminaries. There were Druidesses also, who taught their own sex. The Druids had some knowledge of letters. The king always had a Druid about his person, to pray and sacrifice, and for a judge in civil causes, though there might be a civil judge besides. They appear to have been the sole criminal judges.

The Druid, being a priest, had one eye on earth, wherever the other may have rested, and he devised a mode of raising revenue which far excelled the modern system of pew rent, even in Plymouth Church.

At a certain time in the year, the Druids and their people assembled in a consecrated grove. On the eve of that day all the people were required to extinguish their fires completely, and when the assembly broke up, every head of a family was obliged to take a portion of the consecrated fire of the Druids home to kindle anew the fire in his house, upon which he was to have a year of good luck. He had to pay for this fire; and if any man had not bought and paid for it, he could not have a spark from the cars, nor dust any of his neighbors lend him any, under pain of excommunication, which under the Druidical system was worse than death. The fire dues had to be paid by the last of October, just as the cool weather commenced, which was more efficacious than any statute.

Our "Blind Bob" here seems to have skinned both eyes financially, and to have gained a surer yield of revenue than any modern tax on beer and tobacco can furnish.

It was said of the Druids that "while the kings bore all the envy, the Druids possessed all the sweets, of authority."

They improved one of the divinities of the other sun-worshippers; they made Hercules powerful in learning and eloquence rather than in bodily strength. As to the sacred fire, it was never blown with the mouth, but only with bellows, that it might not be polluted; and was fed with peeled wood, like the sacred fire of the ancient Jews and Persians. In their religious exercises, music was used. They had bards and prophets like the Jews; also a chief Druid, who answered to the high-priest of the latter.

The Druids, like the Egyptian priests, taught the immortality of the soul, while they indulged in human sacrifices, like all the old priests of the sun. Criminals, captives, and strangers were slain at their sacrifices, and their own disciples were put to death for abstaining from their assemblies. Beautiful captives, princes, and the first-born of their children were sacrificed on great occasions. They sometimes ate a part of the human victim sacrificed. But enough of these murderous blind guides, in concluding an account of whom, Godfrey Higgins exclaimed:

"Of all the evils which escaped from Pandora's box, the institution of priesthoods was the worst. Priests have been the curse of the world. . . . Look at China, the festival of Juggernaut, the Crusades, the massacres of St. Bartholomew, of the Mexicans and the Peruvians, the fires of the Inquisition, of Mary, of Cranmer, Calvin, and the Druids; look at Ireland, look at Spain; in short, look anywhere, and you will see the priests reeking with gore. They have converted and are converting populous and happy nations into deserts, and have made our beautiful world into a slaughter-house drenched with blood and tears."

Let us turn for a moment from the Old World to the New, since America can furnish a specimen of a people who were, when discovered, on a plane of civilization with the Asiatic and European sun-worshippers, whose religion and customs we have described. These people emigrated from Asia, crossing the Pacific Ocean, when by reason of islands, and perhaps a continent not now appearing, it was navigable by small water-craft, and established themselves finally in Mexico and Peru, before the age of letters or the use of iron obtained in the country from which they came. Their emperors were children of the sun, their clergy priests of the sun, and they had all the traditions, customs, myths, and religious rites which were current in their native land from a period dating at the supposed flood to the time of their emigration.

These people were visited by the Spaniards for the love of gold and the love of God, and most of their records and books were destroyed by their cruel conquerors because it was feared by the Christian priests that they would betray the fact that the dogmas, ceremonies, and myths of the Romish priesthood had been borrowed from the fire-worshippers of an age long antecedent to the Christian era. The Spanish priests declared that the amazing similarity of the religion of these pagans to their own was the work of the devil, and they burnt the pagan libraries to destroy his infernal work! Now, if it should turn out that these very Spanish priests were as much priests of the sun as those of the Aztecs or the Incas, being worshippers of Oahris by another name, there certainly would appear to have been a great waste of persecution and bloodshed among brethren of the same religion! I will try to exhibit in brief the main features of resemblance between the religion and myths of these people and those of their conquerors.

The Mexicans had a tradition that their ancestors migrated from the West, with details similar to the exodus of the Jews out of Egypt. They were led by a god called Yao-teotle, or "god of armies." They had a tradition of the first pair, called huehue; of a flood, which took place four thousand eight hundred years after the creation, and that before that event the earth was inhabited by giants; they had a character answering to Noah, who entered an ark with six others, and who sent out birds to look for dry land, and that soon after the flood his descendants built a tower of Tulan Cholula, partly to see what was going on in heaven, and from fear of another flood, but it was destroyed by lightning. Here we have Noah and the tower of Babel. They had a "house of God," or Teocalli, at Cholula. They baptized their children in water called "the water of regeneration." Like the Druids, they had all the fires put out one day in the year, and rekindled from the sacred fire in the temple. They had a festival in October answering to All Saints and All Souls, called "the festival of advocates," because every man had an advocate to plead for him.

The Peruvians had a festival in the first month of their year, which a Spanish priest said was contrived by the devil in imitation of the pasover. The Mexicans had a forty days' fast on account of some sacred person who was tempted forty days on a mountain, and who was called "the morning star." The Mexicans revered the cross, as did also the Peruvians, and, I may add, all the ancients, for thousands of years before our era. The Incas had a cross of marble or jasper, of one piece, highly polished. It was kept in a sacred chamber of a palace and held in great veneration. The Spaniards got hold of this, adorned it with stolen gold and jewels, and placed it in the Cathedral of Cuzco as a Christian emblem; and so it was, for the cross and the gold that embellished it had been stolen from the heathen, from whom they had previously borrowed their religion, and hence it was a good emblem of Christian piracy. The Mexican temples were built in the form of a cross. Quetzalcoatl, one of the Aztec deities, is painted as nailed to a cross, and sometimes two thieves are represented as crucified with him. In some pictures the god is represented as being hung, with a cross in his hands. In one picture the cross is red, the clothes colored, and the face and hands quite black. Pictures also represent Quetzalcoatl after crucifixion, as buried, descending into hell, and rising again. In one of the plates, the god is crucified on a mountain. The Mexican Virgin, Chimamatl, was the mother of Quetzalcoatl, and it was a case of immaculate conception,—the old impossible myth.

Of course the Mexicans had an Eve, called Suchi-quecatl, who was informed by a heavenly messenger that she should bear a son who should bruise the serpent's head, and he presented her with a rose. The Mexicans expected a Messiah, and when Cortes appeared, Montezuma suspected he might be the long-looked-for avatar, and he did save them from sinning any more, at any rate, by virtually extinguishing them. It was this awful suspicion of Cortes being the expected god that paralyzed the heathen emperor, and made him and his country an easy prey to the Christians.

The Mexicans had a practice of sacrificing their first-born, the same as the early Jews; and they had also the rite of circumcision, which was performed with a sharp stone. They had a sacred word, like the Egyptians, or the Om of the Hindus, which was never to be spoken, or if so, with the utmost awe. When the Aztecs named their children, "the lips and bosom of the infant were sprinkled with water, and they implored the Lord to permit the holy drops to wash away the sin that was given to it before the foundation of the world, so that the child might be born anew."

The sacerdotal order was immensely numerous: five thousand were attached to the principal temple. There were two high-priests; the lower order of priests were attached each to his particular deity, as with the Egyptians. They had the excellent habit of flagellation, which is the best thing the Roman priests have borrowed from the Pagans, being a species of well-merited and self-inflicted justice worthy of the approval of gods and men. Like true priests, they had the monopoly of education. They knew—what priest ever yet failed to know?—that "Just as the twig is bent, the tree's inclined," or, as one of our ranters exclaimed, "The way we get so many converts is, that we catch 'em young, and then we've got 'em."

The priests were supported by the income from the lands attached to the principal temples, which were called "Houses of God." Human sacrifices obtained to a wonderful extent, amounting sometimes to twenty thousand victims a year, mainly prisoners of war. Though the Aztecs were not low cannibals, taking human flesh as ordinary food, yet they did eat the flesh of the victims whose blood had been poured on the altar of sacrifice. It was a species of sacrament: they ate human flesh from a sense of religious duty, in the same spirit in which their Christian conquerors robbed and murdered them as ungodly Pagans.

Mr. Prescott says, "The priests of the Aztecs administered the rites of confession and absolution. The secrets of the confessional were held inviolable, and penances were imposed of much the same kind as those enjoined in the Roman Catholic Church."

In Peru, Cuzco was "the holy city," answering to Jerusalem with the Israelites. It contained the great temple of the sun, to which pilgrims resorted from the remotest parts of the empire. It was the most splendid edifice in America. The government of Peru was theocratic and despotic, the Emperor, as first representative of the sun, standing at the head of the priesthood. He was a superior, sacred being, scarcely mortal, but Pizarro proved that he could die, nevertheless. When an Inca died, he was said to be "called home to the mansions of his father, the sun."

Embalming was extensively practised, and thus we have another strong resemblance of these people to their ancient brethren of the Old World. We have another in the pyramids. Indeed, they seem to have had all the Old World myths, fables, and religious usages. The lands of Peru were divided into three parts: one for the sun or the priests, one for the Inca, and the remaining third for the people. "Blind Bob" comes up here a great landed proprietor, equal to all the rest of the people put together in the extent of his possessions.

At the grand festival of Raymi, there was a species of Lord's Supper. "In the distribution of bread and wine at this high festival," says Prescott, "the orthodox Spaniards, who first came into the country, saw a striking resemblance to the Christian communion, as in the practice of confession and penance... they discerned a coincidence with another of the sacraments of the Church. The good fathers were fond of tracing such coincidences, which they considered as the contrivance of Satan, who thus endeavored to delude his victims by counterfeiting the blessed rites of Christianity." Which was the counterfeit and which the genuine, which was the original and which the copy, judge ye. For one, after a most careful and laborious examination, I am satisfied that the original was of an age thousands of years before the Christian era; unless, as the Spanish priests thought, the very devil was in it.

Another very remarkable analogy to Catholic institutions was found in Peru in "The Virgins of the Sun," called "the elect," who were nuns, under vows of chastity and devotion, cut off from the world and their own family and friends. Here, according to the Spanish priests, the devil was again at work, and among the women. But there were monks and monasteries several hundred years before Christianity, as the elder Pliny and others testify of a Jewish sect called Essenes. It is not quite fair in the priests of Rome, while succeeding under their Pontifex Maximus to an inheritance of all the dogmas, emblems, myths, and ceremonies of the sun-worshippers of the ancient world, to charge the poor Pagans of America with devilry, when they were simply co-heirs and inheritors of the same doctrines, emblems, myths, and ceremonies, and from the same old religious ancestry as themselves.

WARM WEATHER PHILOSOPHY.—Good advice for warm weather is given by the Philadelphia Times in a consideration of the ten thousand little and big worries and botherations which continually occur, especially at this season of the year. It says: "It does not pay to fight them. To permit ourselves to come in contact with them, is to suffer needless annoyance. Let the porter of the palace car be ever so imperious. We will not notice him. Let the milkman rattle his cans with all the violence he can. We will be as placid as the mildest of his skim-milk. Let the angry servant-girl put soap in our coffee and salt in our sugar and pepper on our raspberries and snuff in our rice pudding. We will quietly reject these articles and leave them for her consumption on her own table, not even affording her the satisfaction of letting her know that we have discovered her mischief. The world is full of gnats and rats and bats, and other worrying pests great and small. Time is too short to give attention to all the worries which these creatures would cause us if we took notice of them. We will shut the door on the whole myriad crowd of them and be calm and happy."

"SCIENTIFIC CREDULITY."

A striking illustration of the anti-scientific bias which prevails in certain spheres of culture is afforded in an article in the London Spectator, wherein that clever journal moralizes at great length over what it calls scientific credulity. The occasion is an ingenious hoax perpetrated last winter by an Australian newspaper, and widely circulated since. The Spectator says:—

"The story having appeared in the Times without comment has, of course, been republished everywhere; and it is amusing to see that in many instances those who republish it think it necessary to be cautious, and repudiate total disbelief. So many wonderful things, they say, and in especial one London journal says, have turned out true that it would be rash to declare this one certainly invented. There is a disposition perceptible to think there may be something in it, though not all that is alleged, and that as Mr. Edison has bottled sound, so Signor Rottura—an Italian name was probably chosen because an Italian has made the most recent and successful experiments in embalming—may have bottled life; that as sound may be reechoed weeks after it was first heard, so a lamb may skip about after it has been some weeks frozen. As there is an electric telegraph, why should not death be baffled? That is a very curious instance of a new form of credulity which is growing up among us,—a credulity which is not faith, but rather disbelief, so far-reaching that it causes a certain powerlessness of mind, an inability to reject at once and decidedly anything that even puts on the appearance of 'science.' The incapacity to weigh evidence—to see, for example, that for this story there is absolutely as yet no evidence at all, any more than there is evidence for the authenticity of Bulwer Lytton's 'Strange Story,' that there is no witness produced, or promised, or named, nothing but an unauthenticated narrative,—is a phenomenon we are all well acquainted with; but this sort of credulity differs in kind from that. It would almost seem as if the advance of science had in some minds decreased the capacity for using the scientific method, as if their confidence in the usual data for reasoning had been gradually so upset that they did not trust them any longer, and did not see why, a far-off locality being granted, parallel lines should not meet or the whole be smaller than the part. That would not, they think, be much more surprising than the phonograph. We observed only a little while ago a statement going the rounds of the newspapers that a certain Texan had eaten his own weight in meat at one sitting, no one apparently perceiving that if that were true then a pint bottle could hold a quart, and reasoning of any kind, even the reasoning necessary for arithmetic or mensuration, was entirely useless and unmeaning. The great truth that if two plus two can be five, counting is nonsense, and that the terms of any conceivable sum in arithmetic would all shift, seems to have lost some of its hold, to the indefinite injury, if the want of gripe became general, of human reasoning power. That is at all events a strange result of the progress of scientific discovery, and it is all the stranger because the new credulity is almost confined to the action of 'science' itself. People are not generally more credulous. They do not believe in each other more than they did, or in unusual events more than they did, and they believe in the supernatural a great deal less than they did. If the Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Houghton and Professor Tyndall all declared that they saw and spoke with a sentient being possessing a body clearly not human, all journalists would at once accuse them either of falsehood or hoaxing or a very suspicious condition of brain and eyesight; but if they all declared they had seen a man swallow a drug which turned him all over both yellow and blue at the same time, the statement would be printed everywhere as the last 'medical marvel.' Yet the former assertion, though requiring, of course, unusually complete evidence, would involve no greater impossibility than the existence of any supernatural being does—which existence half the incredulous accept; while the latter is a contradiction in terms, and no more capable of proof than the assertion that on one occasion and in the usual conditions of the world, water being still water did outweigh mercury, which was nevertheless still mercury. There is the greatest reluctance even to consider any statement involving an acceptance of the supernatural, combined with the most childlike readiness to swallow anything which can be described as a mechanical, medical, or mental marvel."

The Spectator goes on, at greater length than we have space for, to illustrate the various phases of this "new form of credulity," which is indirectly charged to the progress of science. Science has done so much that its disciples are half inclined to believe it can do anything, the Spectator would have us think. But this credulity as to the power of science is very far from being the state of mind which prevails among the scientifically minded. Overcredulousness as to the possibilities of science is the weakness of those who know least of the real character of scientific achievements. In other words, credulity is a condition of ignorance and the lack of rational culture. And the success of scientific hoaxes, so-called, only measures the wide and varied unacquaintance with scientific truths among reputedly intelligent people. To blame science for this, is about as absurd as it would be to blame civilization for the unreasonable beliefs with regard to the powers of civilized men current among certain savages. It is the absence of civilization or science in either case that makes the false idea tenable.

The circumstance that many who are very sceptical with regard to alleged supernatural occurrences unsupported by sufficient evidence are yet over-ready to accept scientific marvels, simply proves that their education is not half completed. They know too little of science, and have had no real training in scientific habits of thought. The Spectator says that men are as credulous now as ever; that the popular appetite for the marvellous has not been diminished by the progress of science, though its direction has been changed, so that men now look to scientific instead of supernatural agencies for its gratification.

"The process of god-making, so often repeated by humanity, is going on again, and Nature is being endowed with attributes which imply an absence of conditions and enveloped in the very atmosphere of awe which once surrounded the supernatural"; which is true only so far as men have not yet been brought directly under the influence of scientific culture. Just so far as men are ready to accept without evidence any assertion made in the name of science we may be sure that they are ignorant of the first great lesson that science has to teach, and that their minds have lacked the training which comes through the acquisition of knowledge by scientific methods. "Scientific credulity" is a contradiction in terms. Credulity is essentially unscientific.—Scientific American.

THE APOTHEOSIS OF TALMAGE.

It was in a blaze of glory that the Rev. Mr. Talmage departed from Brooklyn. A crowded excursion steamer, thronged with his friends and parishioners, went down the bay to see him off, and the last thing visible as the steamers separated was a wildly oscillating figure at the rail of the ocean vessel, and two handkerchiefs which fluttered as one in the rising breeze. The figure was Mr. Talmage, and the handkerchiefs pertained to him and his estimable wife. The accounts which reach us now of the doings of the Talmage party in England would seem to indicate a sort of royal progress. The population is reported as turning out en masse to greet the Brooklyn divine. In London, on a Sunday, the impetuous and enthusiastic multitude is reported to have drawn Mr. Talmage's carriage through the street to the church doors. At Queenstown, when he landed, reports a correspondent,—who is Mr. Talmage himself, by the way,—"deputations from Dublin, Leeds, Liverpool, and London broke in upon us." It is not said in so many words that these deputations were officially appointed to convey to Mr. Talmage the freedom of their respective cities, but the reader may infer that, if he chooses. The following Sunday, Mr. Talmage tells us, he was to preach in London, and after that he was to go "everywhere." He had accepted invitations to Edinburgh, Glasgow, Belfast, Dublin, Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool, and "a few other cities," and then "we will cross over to where they do not speak English and there will be less temptation to talk." But the most interesting part of Mr. Talmage's letter is his acknowledgment of the parting courtesies of his fellow-citizens in Brooklyn. He writes: "I am glad to hear that the Mayor and Common Council got safely back to the city hall, the newspaper men to their offices, the professors to their institutions, the clergymen to their pulpits, and all the people home. God bless you all for the joy you gave us." Why he should have stopped with these acknowledgments, why he should have failed to thank President Hayes and his Cabinet, the two Houses of Congress, and the Judges of the Supreme Court for their participation in his "ovation," is one of those inscrutable mysteries which it is unprofitable to investigate. As it stands, however, the letter is very neatly put, and is calculated to convey the impression that Mr. Talmage's "send off" was of an official sort, in which the city government of Brooklyn and all ranks of people participated.

After all that we learn of the enthusiastic welcome of the Talmage party,—through the letter of Mr. Talmage, who certainly should be well informed,—it is with a feeling of chilling disappointment that we take up the London papers and find them strangely silent about this great upheaval of the people. We never had much respect for the news-gathering ability of the London journals, but it could scarcely be expected that they would regard such scenes of tumult with entire apathy. They gave us some account of the going-on of Captain Booth and his band of Hallelujah Lassies, who made up the Salvation Army of Sheffield; why should they ignore Mr. Talmage, who has introduced more religious novelties than any other man alive? Several weeks have elapsed since Mr. Talmage's letter was written. During that time he has undoubtedly preached in Westminster Abbey, and has very likely taken tea with the Queen, unless her mourning for the young Prince, in sympathy with Eugene, may have prevented such hospitality. But of all these festivities and courtesies, and others like them, we know nothing at all from the great London papers, and shall have to wait for other letters from Mr. Talmage. What are the Times and the Telegraph and the News and those other lumbering and pretentious sheets published for, if it is not to give the news? What do we care about their views on Egypt, or South Africa, or the University Bill? What we want to know is, what is happening to Mr. Talmage and his party.

In the meantime, we hardly need say how exceedingly pleasant and grateful these demonstrations are to Mr. Talmage's countrymen. It is always gratifying when modest and unobtrusive worth receives due recognition. But this is not the only cause for congratulation. Englishmen have sometimes made mistakes about America. They have pounced upon some trashy novel, and held it up as a specimen of American literature. They have studied the ways of some of our flesh aristocracy in their tour of the Continent, and written of them as illustrating American manners. They may even have presented the figure of some ministerial mountebank as a representative of the American pulpit. But in Mr. Talmage America presents to England a specimen of her finest literary culture, an extreme polish of manners, and exceptional grace and power as a preacher. It is, we repeat, a pleasant thing that his shrinking modesty has not prevented this rare combination of qualities from being appreciated and welcomed. In greeting Mr. Talmage the rapturous British crowds do high honor to America; and when he comes back to us, absit longe dies, how jubilant the country will be!—Boston Journal, June 30.

THE TALMUD.

REFERENCES TO JESUS BY THE JEWISH THEOLOGICAL WRITERS.

A correspondent of the New York Herald furnishes the following interesting and curious paper, showing the opinions of Jewish Talmudists concerning Jesus of Nazareth, called the Christ. It settles the question also of the mention of his name in those writings of the Rabbins of old, and, in brief, gives a reason why he was crucified as a heretic:—

"In a late issue of your paper, the writer of an article headed, 'Is Christianity a Failure?' in doubting the historical character of the Christian faith, stated as a fact that Jesus was not mentioned in the Talmud. This is not true. Mr. Palmer (I believe that was the gentleman's name) either did not succeed in working himself through all the huge tomes of the Talmud, or he must have had before him a copy of one of the modern editions from which all passages referring to Jesus and his followers have been carefully expunged by the official hands of the Christian censor. Those very passages, it seems, in spite of their unfriendly spirit, had they been left and permitted to become generally known, would now be of good service to the Christian world. Were it not for truth's sake I should keep silent, looking with secret joy on the mortification of Christianity at her own foolish work that makes her to-day search so eagerly for what she once herself just as eagerly sought to destroy, and what might now, in default of anything better, contribute in a measure to ward off the severe attack made upon her. As it is, if you will kindly allow me, I will readily make known through your paper, to the Christian public, what has been preserved with reference to Jesus in ancient manuscripts and old editions of the Talmud, printed prior to the year 1800, of which there are, to my knowledge, two copies in this city.

"The Talmud, of course, does not say that Jesus or Yeshu, as he is called in rabbinical literature, was the Son of God, nor is it stated there that he himself said he was. According to the Talmudical record Jesus was the son of Mary, who was a friseuse, and married to one Pappus ben Judah. Not this Pappus, however, but another man by the name of Pandira, was the father of Jesus. (Treatise Sanhedrim, 67 a.)

"Jesus is reported to have been in Egypt, where he secretly studied the mysteries of witchcraft. The magicians were very jealous of their mystical knowledge; but being aware of the difficulty of intrusting it to memory, they took the only precaution to prevent its exportation by having the clothes of every stranger who left the country searched for any notes he might have taken. Jesus, however, succeeded in taking with him some notes which he had put down, not on any writing material, but on the skin of his body. (Treatise Sabbath, 104 b.) Jesus was the disciple of the Tanna Rabbi Joshua ben Perachia. This Rabbi is blamed for having inexorably repulsed his heretic pupil. He is, indeed, represented as having accelerated, if not caused, the ultimate apostasy of Jesus from Judaism by turning a deaf ear to his rueful supplications and entreaties for forgiveness. (Treatise Sota, 47 a.)

"This is about all that is reported in the Talmud of the life of Jesus, except that he taught his disciples his own views on the Jewish civil law. (Treatise Abodah Zarah, 17 a.) There are, however, some very interesting points in the report of his trial and the offences for which he suffered death.

"His principal offence is reported to have been ridiculing the doctrines of the Jewish teachers. (Treatise Gittin, 57 a.) But this offence, grave as it was considered to be, was punishable by heaven alone; it was not a crime the penalty of which could be inflicted by human hands. Accordingly, he was accused and condemned to death on the charge of having practised witchcraft and led Israel astray.

"The Jews, like the Church in the days of her power, summarily disposed of heretics. But Jesus being well known to and befriended by the governor of Palestine, they had to grant him a fair trial, so much so, indeed, that for the last forty days previous to his execution, it was made publicly known that he had forfeited his life to the law, and that all who could show cause why sentence should not be passed on him were invited to do so. No one, however, came to say anything in his favor, and consequently he was crucified in Lud (Lydia?) on Easter eve. (Sanhedrim, 43 a.)

"Of the disciples of Jesus, six only are mentioned in the Talmud,—Matthai, Naccan, Nezer, Boni, Todah, and Jacob, of the village Saccania. Of these, all except the last one are reported to have been executed together with their master, having made in vain a desperate effort to save their lives by the queer argument of a jeu de mots of their names with similar words in the Bible (Ibidem). Jacob of Saccania, the disciple last mentioned, must have in some way or other escaped the fate of his colleagues at the time of their execution, and he seems to have afterward saved his life by a shrewd policy. He took care not to teach his master's religious ideas publicly, while on the other hand he seized every occasion of ostentatiously disseminating his innocent views on the Jewish civil law. (Treatise Abodah Zarah, 17 a.) He did not, however, escape suspicion; for when he once offered to cure a nephew of Rabbi Ishmael, who had been stung by a reptile, the Rabbi refused his services, preferring to let his relative die rather than have his life saved by the heretic who might cure him by some improper means, or in the name of his master. (Ibidem, 27 a.)

"The crucified Jesus is mentioned in the Talmud only once. Titus, while in Palestine, is said to have conjured Jesus from the dead, and to have asked him which nation was esteemed highest in heaven. Jesus said Israel was. Titus then continued to ask, 'Shall I wage war upon this people?' To this Jesus replied: 'Seek their good and not their evil; touch them not, for whosoever toucheth them might as well touch the apple of his own eye!' (Treatise Gittin, 57 a.)

"The discussion of the origin and authenticity of these Talmudical reports, interesting as it certainly must be, is a subject not suitable for a daily paper like the Herald; besides it is too complicated a matter for the limited space allotted to these lines. I shall, therefore, confine myself to making a few remarks on the afore-mentioned dialogue between Titus and Jesus. This passage is evidently a fable. It bears the stamp of a later interpolation, and appears to me to have been suggested by a desire of forcing upon the Christian world the conviction that its own faith, out of policy as well as principle, disapproved of the persecution of Israel, and the strong figure put into the mouth of Jesus was intended to impress the inviolability of the Jewish nation upon the minds of her relentless oppressors."—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

CONCERNING future rewards and punishments, Colorado furnishes the following illustration, which occurred recently in a court in La Veta where the testimony of a Chinese was objected to on the ground that he did not understand or regard the obligation of an oath. To test him he was thus interrogated: "John, do you know anything about God?" "No; me no belly well acquaint with him." "Have you no Joss in China?" "Oh yes, gottee heepee Joss." Where do you get when you die?" "Me go to San Francisco." "No, you don't understand me. When Chinaman quit washes all time, and no live any more, where does he go?" "Oh yes, me sabe now. If he belly goodee man, he go uppee sky. If he belly badee man, he go luppee down hellee; allee samee Melican man." The court was satisfied with this orthodox statement, and admitted his testimony.—Editor's Drawer, in Harper's Magazine for July.

ORIENTALISMS.

I.

The Desert.

Angels and gods and demons in the waste,
Semitic prophets, saviors met of old,
The sandy columns that before them rolled,
Whirled by the simoon's breath with lurid haste,
Were guiding deliries. Fierce heat and glare
Filled with illusions all the desert's air,
Fevering each throbbing sense, till voices scarce
Of dead or far-off friends, and shadows dire
Beckon to ruin. Neath the noonday's fire
Mirage rears on the horizon's quivering rim
Green bowers of rest and paradises dim,
With breezy boughs, whence minarets aspire;
There Christ met Satan, and remorseful Paul
A dread voice heard through burning noontide call.

II.

Jerusalem—Delphi.

O temple—cities of the past! your days
Of dominating grandeur were the same;
Upon the mountains pedestalled, the rays
Of morning kindled you with orient flame.
Phobos—Jehovah—each a mighty name,
Which spellbound many a glorious ancient race,
Gave to your temples all their sway and fame,—
Each was a genius loci, spirit of a place
And nation grand, which could the ages mould.
The Lord of light and prophecy and song
Hes to a lovely myth been dwindled long.
Still o'er the poet's land he away doth hold,
While Israel's perfect lore of right and wrong
The empire of his god will still prolong.

The Index.

BOSTON, JULY 24, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

REASON AND MORALITY.

It is seen that rationalism should seek to vindicate its rationality. It should aim to be distinguished for judicial calmness and intellectual self-possession rather than headlong impetuosity, for breadth of intellectual view and sympathy rather than narrowness,—in fine, for vigorous genuine intellectual culture. But, unfortunately, correct thinking does not always go with correct living, though unquestionably a most important aid to it. A large brain, and an active and educated one, does not necessarily presuppose correspondent moral qualities. Hence rationalism, or what has claimed and still claims to pass for such, has suffered to no small extent from not laying greater stress upon the latter particulars. A belligerent and destructive attitude toward Christian theology or religion in general, though inevitable and more or less desirable in a period of transition like that which rationalism signalizes, is not in itself sufficient to ensure the best order of society or highest standard of individual character. This the Church discovered long ago. It saw that the rationalist needed more than his rationalism to make him the pattern always of even the natural virtues. But, instead of presenting the true explanation of the case, the Church ingeniously made it more confusing. Instead of admitting the right and worth of reason coupled with the inculcation of its insufficiency unless supplemented by morality, the Church assailed reason itself. It charged reason with being the cause of all the moral shortcomings which might be associated with it. Forgetting the beam in its own eye, it saw only that in the eye of those outside its fellowship. Instead of declaring that reason needed more than reason, it declared it immoral and to be condemned. It was to be treated as the enemy of human welfare, rather than its indispensable ally and most trustworthy friend. If reason was immoral, then religion, which was assumed to be the support and guardian of morality, must be all the more strenuously and zealously guarded and defended, its authority rendered all the more absolute and binding. Of course the recognition of this fact, that reason needed the supplement of conscience and character in order to make it a safe dependence, may have exercised but a subordinate part in determining the idea of reason which the Church adopted and advanced. But that it was swayed much by this consideration, and it became an important factor in the formation of its conclusion in respect to reason, does not admit a doubt. It was under the influence of this persuasion and such sanctions that the Church made relentless war on freethinkers. It constituted, if not the whole, certainly a part of the ground of its justification for the ruthless persecution of every one who thought his way out of its doctrines and dared to impart his opinions to others. Nor is this view, that reason and immorality are synonymous, altogether extinct. It is still promulgated by the Christian Church, and even in its most enlightened sections, slanderous as it is. It is only a few years since, that a distinguished clergyman, here in Boston, affirmed that free religion goes to wreck in Ann Street,—in other words, runs out in the lowest depths. And for months the Rev. Joseph Cook, in the face and full possession of ample knowledge to the contrary, has been maliciously and unscrupulously perambulating the country with the falsehood upon his lips, that the Free Religious Association, and Free Religionists in general, are in favor of the free circulation of obscene literature. Could there be a baser or more unwarranted calumny? This outrageous misrepresentation has been reiterated during the past week by no less eminent person than the Rev. Dr. Leonard Bacon, ex-President of Yale College, in the Christian Union. We are willing to give Dr. Bacon, what the distinguished person before mentioned is not entitled to, the benefit of the supposition that he has been misled in making the grave charge against liberals that appears under his name through the misrepresentations of Joseph Cook and such vilifiers of them. Let this be as it may, it is an impressive lesson to liberals everywhere, of the importance of shunning all ambiguity in respect to their attitude upon questions of morals. We do not lose sight of the difficulties that beset such an effort. It will be charged at once that rationalism itself, in the eyes of the Church, is immoral, as we have seen it has been and is still the habit of the Church to assume; that the radical's position on any question, be it whatever it may, is sure to be subjected to this opprobrium.

But there are some accusations so self-evidently weak and unreasonable, that in certain stages of society and intellectual life at least they disprove themselves. The charge that rationalism in itself, or intelligent criticism of existing religious theories, leads to immorality is such an one to-day. Whatever force the allegation may have had in former times, in the majority of instances it possesses, even within Orthodox circles, but little weight at present. The world is getting to see pretty clearly that the charge is stupid, unjust, and untenable. It is getting to see that while the rationalist may not necessarily be the model man in every instance in respect to all the virtues, he may nevertheless take rank, as has been the case not unfrequently with the most unqualified representatives of the class, with the noblest and the best. That this is getting to be recognized by the more intelligent and fair-minded inside as well as outside of the Church, is confirmed by the late speech of Cardinal Newman on his induction into his present ecclesiastical office. In that speech he dwelt at length upon the rationalistic tendencies of the present time, and, while he deplored their prevalence, and declared that his energies would continue to be, as they had been in the past, largely devoted to their resistance and overthrow, confessed that many of the most prominent rationalists of the time were distinguished for humanity, benevolence, and purity of character. It does not follow, if the fact which Cardinal Manning thus frankly acknowledges of the compatibility of reason and morality were more generally recognized, that there would be a correspondent turning to rationalism. For it is an unfortunate peculiarity of the human mind that it does not always act rationally, or according to its actual convictions and mental perceptions of things. There are various reasons for this. But to return to questions of moral action: Outside of speculative questions concerning religion, science, politics, and the like, upon which men may differ without any necessary detriment to their moral character or reflection upon their spirit and purposes, there is another sphere of conviction and conduct where a person must stand with the higher general intelligence and sentiment of society, or forfeit his place in its confidence and respect. To these standards of right and duty, differ as much as he may on others, he must conform, or sacrifice the common respect. There is but one way of thinking or acting with reference to them. If he think or speak otherwise, the moral judgment of society is against him. They are no longer questions. They are settled principles of human welfare and proprieties of human relation and conduct evolved from the barbarism of the past, and so clearly demonstrated to the general intelligence and moral sentiment of society as to have acquired the sanction and authority of law. They are those fundamental duties and obligations of life which are so plainly perceived to possess such a character that men no longer disagree in respect to them. Let this test be brought to bear upon some of the questions which have agitated rationalism, and from which it has suffered and is likely to continue to suffer most deplorable reproach. Take the question, for example, of free love, which is put forth by some rationalists as a higher principle of civilization. Now if there is any single truth which the progress of human intelligence has established it is this: that monogamic marriage is superior to all other forms which have existed, and that there is no relation possible of the sexes so favorable to the welfare of society and the family, the happiness and purity of its individual members. It is not necessary in affirming this to maintain that marriage, such marriage as that referred to, is always, as it exists at present, faultless, or all that it may or ought to be. But the remedy is not abolition, but reformation. It is not that the relation is incapable of nobler realization, but that those who have entered into it fail to infuse and shape it in accordance with their highest ideal conceptions, to elevate and fill it with that unselfishness, sincerity, purity, and sweetness of affection which are within the attainment of its lofty possibilities. Accepting, then, this conception of marriage as the demonstrated and incontrovertible truth of civilization and the advanced intelligence of to-day, whoever would seek to lead mankind back to the grosser and more lax customs in respect to such relationship, or any analogous to them, of by-gone times, cannot fail to be regarded as the disorganizer of society, an enemy to its moral order and to all that is most fair and beautiful in its relations, and find resting upon him the disapprobation and reproach of the best conservatives and radicals alike of his fellow-men.

Other illustrations in the same direction of thought, from certain aspects of radicalism, might be referred to, but would extend the discussion beyond its proper limits at this time. But this much, at least, we must say in conclusion: that if radicalism would have any force or influence, any respectability or worth in the eyes of those whose esteem it should desire, wherever else it may be lax, here it must be stringent, wherever else it fails to draw the line, if the question is one of clear and established morality it must not hesitate to draw it. Its trumpet must give no uncertain sound. Upon its banner must be inscribed in characters that cannot be mistaken or obliterated, not reason alone, but reason and morality; and by this sign it shall conquer.

HERESY.

It is pretty clear that there is a good deal of troublesome insubordination inside of the Orthodox lines at present. Across the water the staid old Scottish church of John Knox is in fearful commotion. The Rev. David Macrea has been held to stern account because disposed to undervalue that precious doctrine of sound theology, eternal future punishment. Wm. Robertson Smith, an Aberdeen professor and an accomplished scholar and theologian, with a reputation beyond his years, is another grave transgressor. It is his offence to have rashly let in upon the pages of the Bible more of the light of the results of his research than the tender pupils of those accustomed to established notions of it could bear. The case was this: Prof. Smith some years before had contributed an article to the Encyclopædia Britannica upon the Bible. In this article Prof. Smith, with much frankness, ventured to give expression to certain well-considered doubts he entertained in regard to the contents of the volume. The Presbyterians of Aberdeen took up the matter, and though a strong opposition was shown to the professor's views, it was impossible to effect a sentence of condemnation against him. But the persistent and greatly exercised Scotchmen, whose devout sensibilities had been so sorely outraged by Prof. Smith's free and honest handling of the book, were not satisfied to let him escape thus easily and pursue unmolested his studies.

Accordingly the Glasgow Assembly of 1878 returned to the charge. Sir Henry Moncrieff, an ardent defender of the inviolability of the inherited faith, moved the Assembly should reverse the Aberdeen decision. A stormy time ensued, which closed at length with a majority vote of twenty-three for Sir Henry's motion, or three hundred and one for it to two hundred and seventy-eight opposed. But the affair was not yet ended. There are a good many wheels in ecclesiasticism, even comparatively simple Scotch Presbyterianism. As a consequence, the General Assembly, which met a few weeks ago, felt itself called upon to bring the subject up before its body for discussion, and at length reaffirmed by a vote of three hundred and twenty-one against three hundred and twenty (or three hundred and nineteen as some declare) the action of the Glasgow Assembly a year before. Its final decision remains, however, until the next annual meeting, Prof. Smith, in the meantime, being required to abandon his divinity classes and teaching.

The Vermont Congregationalists at their recent State Convention had an exciting debate upon the same general subject,—heretical tendencies within their fellowship. Some wanted the historic doctrines to constitute the adopted standard of faith among the brethren. Others contended for the freer and more open mode of determining it by the teachings of the "Word of God." But the shrewd and cunning older-headed conservatives saw very clearly that if there was not a mouse in the meal there was a very good chance for one to get in it, if this should be left as the terms of adjustment; because the history of the Church shows all along that this settling the faith by a simple reference to the "Word of God" is very difficult and precarious business. Luther made an attempt at it. He proposed "the Bible, and the Bible only, as the faith of Protestants"; and behold the consequences! No, no, said these wary fathers of Congregationalism and their allies; that would be opening the door of the household of faith to Annihilationism, Universalism, Unitarianism, Rationalism, and all the other ravening wolves in sheep's clothing, that might seek entrance.

The consequence is, that Vermont Congregationalism just now is in a very disturbed and unsatisfactory condition. Closely following upon the heels of the Vermont Congregational Infelicities comes the case of the Rev. Mr. Lockwood of the same denomination, of Kennebunk, Maine. It appears that Mr. Lockwood's mind, like a good many of his brethren, is not quite clear, or in a state of suspense, as it is expressed, in regard to the disturbing doctrine of future punishment. The council that was called to install him, "after earnest and prayerful consideration" of his case have put their report into some resolutions, the gist of which is contained in the following:—

"Resolved, That while we commend his frankness in opening to the council this state of suspense, and are personally drawn toward our brother by the earnestness of his Christian purpose, his otherwise clear views of truth, and his nine years of devoted ministry, yet because our churches have, as regards this matter, a well-understood faith, based upon the interpretation of the Word of God, commonly styled 'Evangelical,' and because they agree in deeming decisive views necessary to fellowship:

Therefore, we advise the installation be deferred until such time as Brother Lockwood's investigation shall have issued in that assured conviction of the truth for which we look, and which our churches have been accustomed to require in their ministry."

A Maine contemporary, commenting upon the above, says:—

"Were Mr. Lockwood alone in suspense, it might not matter so much; but our esteemed neighbor the Lewiston Journal, a Simon-pure Orthodox paper, never known to tell a lie about anything pertaining to religion, has this to say of other Congregational ministers:—

"We understand that there are other Congregational pastors and laymen in the State whose views are similar to those of Mr. Lockwood. One of the pastors who is preaching in this part of the State under the auspices of the Maine Missionary Society, it is said has recently written to the officers of the society that his views are similar to Mr. Lockwood's. He writes that he is moved by the results of the Lockwood Council to advise the church fathers of his substantial agreement with Mr. Lockwood's views respecting the future life."

Indeed, so pronounced are these manifestations of discontent and instability with respect to doctrines inside of Congregationalism in general, that we learn the editors of the Congregationalist and certain persons in the Western States are already moving for the preparation of a new or revised creed for Congregational churches.

A writer in the Christian Union offers some opposing considerations to such a step. He says:—

"The first reason which we would suggest is, that the National Council held in Boston in 1865 prepared and published a statement of the general doctrines accepted by our churches. This statement referred to and reiterated in substance the confessions and platforms of 1648 and 1680. The declaration then made has been sufficient for the necessities of the Christians who adopt our polity, while it has suitably and satisfactorily connected us with the old historic creeds. It seems unworthy of our body to be engaged in new revisions of the fundamental statements of our faith as often as once in fourteen years. The assembling of a company of learned men, or of a great council, to make a readjustment of things at so early a date presents the appearance of instability, which men will regard as hardly creditable to Congregationalists as compared to the other great Christian communities."

We entirely agree with the above writer. Such a proposition as that to which he refers does give a very decided "appearance of instability" to Orthodox Congregationalism; and the worst of it is that it is a good deal more than an appearance. Christian truth, which it has been common for Orthodox teachers to represent as something very clear and plain, has become an exceedingly uncertain thing in these days.

The preceding are only some of the more conspicuous cases of heresy that have of late come to the surface. A score of others might be mentioned in all the denominations, that have been noticed in the papers while these have been before the public, but have attracted less general attention; showing that Orthodoxy in all its forms is in a very restless and uncomfortable condition at present. It is a good deal like throwing freight overboard in a storm. It will have to keep on throwing its theology overboard until it is all gone, and even then we fear the old ship of Orthodoxy will be so badly damaged that it will have to be abandoned.

A QUERY.

I noticed a statement the other day that Christianity abolished polygamy. As this is a question of great practical interest at the present time, will some of your readers give us the information, or tell us where it may be found, as to when and how polygamy (which from the New Testament record appears to have been extinct among the Jews of the time of Jesus) was abolished among that people? Was the Christian Church obliged to make express enactments in regard to it, or did it simply endorse monogamy as the generally received morality of the time and country?

IS THE LEAGUE A CHURCH?

The acting editor has saved me the trouble of proving a negative, in showing textually that each individual auxiliary League may do just what it pleases, so long as it aids in promoting the expressed object of the National League. It can be as narrow as a nunnery or as broad as the admirable society at Florence, though the constitution recommended for auxiliaries does not seem to include any machinery—any anathema maranatha—for winnowing out even the heresy of "free love." I could not possibly argue the case against secession better than the acting editor has done, in showing that while Mr. Abbot did not design the League for a church of rationalism, he did think, as I do, that in the meetings of the local leagues everything for which a church is valuable may be effected, without the mischiefs which necessarily flow from the ecclesiastical idea of a church. Whose fault will it be if this cannot be done? But—we may exclaim, in the words of dear Tom Hood, if the League in either branch of it is to adopt the sentiment expressed by the editor's anonymous correspondent. It was well to keep shady the name of a man who could write such a sentence as this: "A melancholy day it was when the Liberal League movement in America struck hands with free-lovism and hoisted the motto, 'Liberty and Obscenity, one and inseparable.'" If the author of this sentence is not a conscious liar, it would be cruel to blazon his name: if he is, he may as well be left to rot in obscurity.

"Oh for the rarity

I cheerfully concede that the acting editor of THE INDEX may know more of the League meetings than I do, and may be better able to draw the right moral from the bitter feuds in the anti-slavery movement; but I am very sure that a considerable proportion of the readers of THE INDEX will agree with me that the Christian Society for the Suppression of Vice, of which Colgate and Comstock are the managers, is a hypocritical raid on freedom of thought and speech, which has taken advantage of the credulity of some nice people in the League, who do not know so much of the real facts in the case as even I do. I will not impugn their moral courage, but I do say, and in fact know, that they are the victims of a most impudent system of lying. They are scared out of their senses on a subject which, perhaps fortunately, they have never had an opportunity to study. I reverence their sensitiveness, and am really sorry for them. Time will cure their malady. E. W.

A POPULAR FALLACY.

Judging from the frequency with which it is pressed into service, the argument against materialism founded on the impossibility of our conceiving how matter can think must be thought by many a very strong and effective argument. It seems to be assumed that conceivability is the test of truth and the conceptive faculty the measure of objective possibility. Persons who repeat this argument do not look far enough, apparently, to see that, whatever be the basis and cause of thought, it is impossible to conceive how it thinks. If we cannot establish in consciousness a relation between thought and collocations of matter and force, neither can we frame such a relation between thought and an "unextended substance" or an immaterial entity, of whose existence, even, we can form no conception. And here I am reminded of what Locke says on this subject:—

"Since on which side soever he views it, either as an unextended substance or as a thinking extended matter, the difficulty to conceive either will, whilst either alone is in his thoughts, still drive him to the contrary side. An unfair way which some men take with themselves, who, because of the inconceivableness of something they find in one, throw themselves violently into the contrary hypothesis, though altogether as unintelligible to an unbiased understanding."

"But it is further urged that we cannot conceive how matter can think. I grant it; but to argue from thence that God cannot, therefore, give to matter a faculty of thinking, is to say God's omnipotency is limited to a narrow compass, and brings down God's infinite power to the size of our capacities."

"For if this be a right rule of reasoning, to deny a thing to be because we cannot conceive the manner how it comes to be, I shall desire them who use it to stick to this rule and see what work it will make both in divinity as well as philosophy, and whether they can advance anything more in favor of scepticism."

More inability to realize in thought processes involving complex relations cannot be urged in fairness against any theory. True, conceivability as a test of truth has value in matters of every-day life, but its value diminishes in proportion as it is applied beyond the range of experience. Hamilton observes that "the philosophy of the conditioned proves that things there are which may, nay which must, be true, of which nevertheless the mind is unable to construe to itself the possibility."

The fact that there are relations external to the mind which are inconceivable to us shows simply that the "number and complexity of subjective relations have not yet been able to rival those of the objective relations producing them." And this we should expect a priori on the theory of evolution. What men were once unable to conceive they now can readily conceive, and many relations inconceivable now, may be clearly represented in thought a thousand years from now.

I do not deny that materialists have often employed the same fallacy here pointed out in their reasonings against the theory of an immaterial mind; but if there is proof of such an entity, or, rather, if there are no arguments against it except that we cannot conceive how it can be, this argument, since it pertains to that which is beyond the sphere of experience, is of no value whatever.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MRS. ANSON BURLINGAME is passing the summer at Pittsfield, Mass.

MR. T. B. ALDRICH, the poet, is summering at "Aldrich" cottage, Lynn.

PRINCE BISMARCK has given a dinner in honor of Andrew D. White, our minister to Germany.

MR. H. B. BLACKWELL (the husband of Lucy Stone Blackwell) and his daughter Alice have sailed for Europe.

MRS. ANNA S. PILLSBURY, the mother of Parker Pillsbury, died at Henniker, N.H., July 8, at the age of ninety-five.

MISS ANNA DICKINSON, who is in Philadelphia, in good spirits, still cherishes, it is said, the intention of returning to the stage.

IT IS STATED that neither the speeches nor life of Sumner find sufficient sale to encourage their continued publication at present.

JOHN B. GOUGH is about to return home from England. He has given one hundred and fifty lectures during his visit there this time.

MR. B. P. SHILLABEE (Mrs. Partington) has just completed his sixty-fifth year. Some of his friends celebrated with him the event a few evenings since.

MISS JENNIE LEYS, a popular Spiritualist lecturer who has been ill for some time, is said to be recovering, and will probably return to the platform before long.

MR. J. MEERINSON, at a recent Unitarian Conference on the Pacific Coast, read an essay upon "Comparative Religion," showing that all religions are branches of one root.

HARBI ISAAC M. WISE, editor of the American Israelite, is entitled to be considered a veteran in connection with the Jewish press of this country. He has just completed his twenty-fifth year of such editorial experience. Few wield a more vigorous and trenchant pen.

MR. JOHN FISKE has been very successful with his lectures in England on American History. Herbert Spencer, Huxley, and other persons of like note have been attendants. A volume of his essays on Darwinism and kindred subjects will be brought out by Macmillan & Co. before many weeks.

PROF. SIR C. WYVILLE THOMSON has been compelled to relinquish his course of lectures at the University of Edinburgh on account of sudden indisposition. His physicians deem it prudent that he should abstain from lecturing again this session. His large class of between four hundred and five hundred students has accordingly been entrusted to Prof. Alleyne Nicholson, of St. Andrews.

REV. HERMAN BISBEE died recently at South Boston, on Sunday, very suddenly, of apoplexy it is supposed. Mr. Bisbee occupied his pulpit on the morning of his death, and died about an hour after the service. He was educated for the Universalist ministry, but had been for some years associated with Unitarianism. His sympathies were with the more progressive portion of the denomination, and his writings occasionally found their way into radical journals.

IT WILL BE pleasant news to many to learn that a letter has been received from the veteran reformer, George Jacob Holyoake, of England, at the office of THE INDEX, stating that he expects to sail about the middle of August for this country. Mr. Holyoake contemplates spending a short time, on his arrival, in Boston, whence he will visit Washington and the South, and probably return home near the middle of November. We trust the liberals of the country will extend him a cordial greeting, and that arrangements may be made to hear him from their platforms.

THE ARCHAIC ALPHABET.

The excellent paper in THE INDEX of the 10th, by Mr. Janes, on the cuneiform inscriptions and the relation between their legends and the early part of Genesis, has been recalled to my mind by the work of F. Lenormant in French, on The Propagation of the Phœnician Alphabet in the Ancient World. His statements, although only indirectly related to those of Mr. Janes, are perhaps important enough to justify you in printing a few of them in THE INDEX. I suppose that anything that throws light on prehistoric periods and people is interesting to progressive minds. It is noticeable, at any rate, that history grows equally at both ends, and that as we get more and more forward in sound thinking and good activities, so we establish further and further backward the range of authentic history; and, besides, Lenormant discusses the Assyrian alphabet.

Lenormant's work, observe, is not primarily on languages or systems of words, but on alphabets as means of recording words. His first generalization, though not by any means wholly new, is still agreeably complete. It is this: Writing can only be by two methods: 1. The ideographic, which represents ideas; or, 2. The phonetic, which represents sounds. Of these, the former has choice of two proceedings; viz., to make actual pictures of objects, or else to portray objects or to draw signs agreed upon, in order to express abstract ideas. Again, the phonetic proceeding must be one of two: either syllabic, which puts one sign for each syllable; or alphabetic, which puts one sign for each sound. And the natural process of men has always been to begin with the pictures, and to end with the single-sound letters. Proved cases of the hieroglyphic or pictorial beginning are those of the Chinese, Assyrian, the Nahuas in Mexico, the Egyptians. Sufficient evidence of this is given, and, by way of comparison, some lower grades of record systems are cited. Thus the Peruvian quippos or quipus, being systems of cords with knots tied in them, were not themselves records, but were helps to memory, exactly as a knot in one's handkerchief is; a mere jog to recall thoughts whose record is wholly within the mind, and meaningless except to those who committed to memory the story referred to. The sticks or belts of wampum handed to one and another of his followers by an Indian orator are such another means. So, probably, were the wooden rods or tally-sticks in primeval use among the ancestors of the Germans and Scandinavians, and whose existence is still chronicled by the word used for "letter" in their languages; viz., buch-staben, bok-stafir—i.e., book-sticks. These methods are not literary records at all, for such tell a story of themselves, instead of recalling it only to one who knows it already. M. Lenormant might have cited a still cruder method of crystallizing facts in the memory,—the old practice of thrashing boys at the bounds of a parish, so that the said boys should ever afterwards know the same.

It would be a pleasure to give M. Lenormant's most lucid and intelligent exposition of the different sorts of hieroglyphic notation as exemplified in Egyptian, Assyrian, and other systems; but I shall only add the outline of the rest of his main doctrine. The mere statement of it will, it seems to me, show how interesting the details must be. It is thus: 1. The Egyptian system of writing was modified in the usual way, the hieroglyphic system giving rise to a comparatively brief or short-hand system of modifications from the original pictures, known as the hieratic system. In this, along with some pictures, there came to be used signs for syllables, and some for single letters. A certain style of this hieratic character was used in the so-called ancient empire of Egypt before the time of the Hyksos or Shepherd Kings; that is, before the eighteenth dynasty (which Brugsch makes to begin 1700 years B.C.). Now, at some not very precisely ascertained time before this date, but at a time before the introduction of the Phœnician alphabet into Greece, the Phœnicians were the commercial nation of the world, were in constant and intimate relations with Egypt, and as merchants needed a sure and swift mode of writing. Under this stimulus they took a select number of the Egyptian hieratic signs, gave them more or less modified powers, but made all those powers alphabetic, or letter-wise,—not syllabic nor pictorial—and thus introduced alphabetic writing into the world, and enabled me to write and you to print this article. The Phœnician invention, observe, was in selecting representatives of sounds. What they perceived was this: It takes a great many sorts of signs to make a picture for each thought and thing, and complicated, slow-written signs at that. It takes far less of them to make a sign for each syllable, and it will take far less, again, to make a sign for each sound. So the economical, practical, mercantile Phœnician genius contrived to do, with twenty-two characters, what the syllabic method required hundreds of signs for, and the hieroglyphic method thousands. Business made literature.

From this point M. Lenormant shows and proves, by arguments, plates, and tables, how this Phœnician assortment of sounds, and their signs, became the civilized alphabet, forming the basis of all the written alphabets of Europe and Asia. Here I stop; but let any one interested in comparative philology be sure to read this most suggestive and entertaining book. I have not given any of the many curious facts strung all along the discussion. For instance, it is now proved by the monuments that writing was known in Syria before Moses; and this destroys the argument that Moses could not have written the Pentateuch because there was no Semitic alphabet in his day to write with. But the fact is, I would like to translate and reprint the whole book.

THREE SOCIAL FORCES:

THE CONSERVATIVE; THE REACTIONARY; THE PROGRESSIVE.—WHICH WILL PREVAIL IN 1880?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

It must be evident, even to the merely casual observer of the political movements and tendencies of the day, that the whole subject of politics—at least in this country—is in a very chaotic condition; that a great amount of confusion exists in men's minds; that the issues of the past, which were formerly the "rallying points" of parties, are becoming more and more recognized as—dead, dead, DEAD! that the old parties formed on such issues are irretrievably disorganized; that their disintegration is rapidly taking place, and that scarcely anything is left to distinguish them from each other but insignificant and inappropriate party names; that Republican principles, as distinguished from Democratic principles, in relation to present circumstances, signify NOTHING.

It must also be obvious to the casual observer that ONE OF THE CONSEQUENCES OF THE RELEASING OF PUBLIC OPINION from party fetters and from the prejudices of the past, and of the disruption of the old parties, is the gradual formation of new parties out of the disorganized elements. The man must be an optimist indeed who does not see that new issues have arisen which not only cannot be ignored, but which cannot be placed in a subordinate position; if old issues are not yet fully decided, they must at least take "back places"; that neither of them can ever again become the rallying-cry of a party that has any chance of obtaining political success.

But, Mr. Editor, it is not yet so evident to the merely casual observer what is to be the outcome of the prevailing chaos. Who is able to say positively what are to be the issues, or what is to be the chief issue, that will again divide the nation into two great parties? I say—two great parties, because the existence of a third great party is an anomaly. Even a moderately powerful third party shows an abnormal state of things; a state of things that cannot be lasting, and a state of things too injurious to the welfare of the people to be long endured. The wise student of politics, then, is he, who, not forgetting the unfinished work of the past, and watching carefully the superficial and crude movements of the present and the general drift of events, seeks to pierce through the mist and confusion, and discover the hidden forces that are gradually but irresistibly moulding the combinations and organizations of the future. It is to suggest some points for reflection, in this connection, that I ask for space in your paper; and I do so with the hope that others, unselfishly interested in public questions and possessed of greater knowledge and ability, will give their best thoughts to the public through the channels that will reach the greatest number of thoughtful readers.

To come, now, to the pith of my subject: I recognize as powerfully operative in society to-day to each other, and each engaged in a death struggle for the mastery. I know no more fitting words to denote these forces than (1) the conservative; (2) the reactionary; and (3) the progressive. The first and the third may be considered the natural and normal forces of healthy society. The second is an abnormal force, and it indicates an unhealthy and disturbed condition. But it is not, on that account, an undesirable force to have. Its existence proves the loss of equilibrium between the conservative and the progressive, and its function is to restore equilibrium. But, although it is a necessary force under certain conditions, it is nevertheless dangerous; so dangerous that, although it may not destroy society altogether, it may check the advance of civilization for centuries. The downfall of Roman and Grecian civilization, and the dreary centuries known as the "dark ages," in Europe, were mainly caused by the reactionary force. The result of the French Revolution of 1789 in checking the development of civilization in that country (which I believe to be a fact) was caused by the triumph of a reactionary policy. France is a century behind England and Germany in real progress, and still further behind the United States. But the United States is now approaching a critical point in its history. It has reached a point of development and a condition of its life as a nation that is pregnant with immense consequences to the future of civilization. Whether those consequences will be good or evil, will depend upon the failure or the success of the present reactionary tendency of our politics. This tendency—in one form or another—is plainly revealing itself and growing in size and momentum. At present the conservative force of society is the principal—I had almost said the only—resisting force.

The progressive force seems to me to be at the present moment almost passive. Even where it is not absolutely passive or neutral, it is vacillating. In the presence of the almost convulsive struggle between the stolid power of conservatism and the passionate efforts of the reactionary movement, the progressive force seems to be paralyzed. Will it ally itself with the former or with the latter, or is there any third course for it to adopt? is the important question that time alone can solve. But, quitting abstractions, let me try to make my meaning plainer by GIVING PERSONALITY AND SUBSTANCE TO THESE MOVEMENTS.

The conservative force means, of course, the powerful influences that are governing and controlling all the great interests of the people to-day, whether it is called the "money-power," or "incorporated wealth," or "the great monopolies," or the Republican party, or the Democratic party. It makes no difference what we call it; the phrase "centralized wealth," in private hands, sums it up completely. Against this power the forces I have called "reactionary" and "progressive" are both contending, but they are fully as antagonistic towards each other as either is towards their common enemy.

The reactionary force finds, at present, its most powerful expression in the Greenback party, and it will have in alliance with it such movements as that led by Denis Kearney in California, any movement looking towards the prevention of the consolidation of capital, and any movement having for its object the distribution of land and capital. All these movements are reactionary, because they propose to meet the evils that demand a new organization of society by going back to an old organization of society not adapted to modern conditions. I call these movements, and many others of the same kind, reactionary, because they are hostile to and obstructive of the gradual consolidation of all public interests in the hands of the people collectively.

The reactionary movement is, essentially, a middle-class movement; it had its origin in that class, and it has its main strength wherever that class is the most influential. Its sole object is to prevent the absorption of that class by the upper and lower classes of society. The middle class is, and always has been, the bulwark of tyranny and oppression. The fiat of civilization—more powerful than "fiat money"—has doomed its extinction.

But the Greenback-middle-class-reactionary party may be able to postpone the inevitable for a time by securing the support of a large proportion of the class beneath it in social position; the class which is in closest contact with itself; the class which is largely dependent upon it, and over which, in many ways, it can exercise considerable influence. I mean the class of wage-laborers. In a political struggle between consolidated capital and a host of small capitalists scattered throughout the country, it will not be difficult, in most cases, for one of the latter to persuade his workmen and poor neighbors that, as against the great capitalists, and especially as against the great corporations, their interests are common.

The subject of

is too involved for most men of any class to see their way through; and the wage-laborer, who only surely recognizes something wrong, will generally accept such a solution as one that will throw the blame upon the party or the powers that be, and he will be ready to vote for any change.

Now, although I believe that the issue that will divide the country in 1880, and decide the presidential election, is not the true issue, and that it would not be the de facto issue if every voter understood and would vote for his own real interests, it seems to me that the struggle will be, not between conservatism and progress, but between conservatism and reaction. It is to be a struggle, not between capitalists and laborers, but between two classes of capitalists. As Gen. Butler would describe it, it is to be a struggle between capital and "entrapment." (His definitions of these terms being: Capital, wealth inherited and invested in bonds. Entrapment, wealth obtained in any way and invested in business.) It is not to be a struggle against monopoly and privilege, but against any reduction in the number of monopolists and privileged persons. Judging from present appearances, it seems to me that the chances of conservatism and of reaction in the coming contest are about equal. But the probable action of the progressive force is still to be considered. Is there any political movement representing it? Will it take any part in the election, and, if so, will it be an independent party? Or will it side with either of the prominent parties, and with which?

My letter has already reached such a length that I must ask permission to attempt a reply to these questions in a future issue.

IN RESPONSE.

DEAR MR. CLARK:—

I must write to thank you for the "Preliminary Considerations" in THE INDEX of the 3rd inst. It expresses so well and urges so strongly the very views and policy which, had I been able, I myself would willingly have fathered, that it relieves me of the fear I felt, of finding no considerable or influential companionship in maintaining the attitude in question. Your editorial and Mr. Potter's Report to the Free Religious Association satisfy me that in you and those for whom you speak I may find that true order of knighthood and church militant in one—the church of the natural "Revelation" and the knighthood of justice and beneficence—whose tents I have been wandering in search of for a long time, eager to volunteer for the service, if but as the humblest of camp-followers. "There is none [you say] of the existing organizations in the interest of rationalism, even with all they include worthy of preservation and destined to be preserved, sufficiently comprehensive in its scope to afford a satisfactory basis for the constructive work before radicals at present; that can be so remodelled as to harmoniously answer to the best conceptions, larger views, and higher aspirations that are teeming in the brains and quickening the heart-beats of an ever-increasing multitude." I am no critic of present organizations, as my knowledge of them is of the slightest, but I take it that your utterance is practically ex cathedra. As to the urgent need for a proper one, however, I can hardly help being very positive. The absurd pretensions of certain sects and systems to the contrary notwithstanding, the ills that flesh is heir to have by no means been reduced to the minimum, whether measured by the absolutely ultimate ideal, or with reference to the particular stage of attainment which the necessarily gradual character of progress obliges us to accept as at least relatively the ideal for our times. It is beside the point to say that nothing that we can do, in any form of effort, could make the world perfect, or even rid us of the greater part of the evil which now exists. The point is that we have by no means exhausted the available means of amelioration, and that it is morally certain that by doing even but a portion of what we can, but have hitherto failed to do, we should achieve for ourselves a degree of improvement well worth all the effort needed therefor. Practical fatalism as to the fate of all but our individual selves is by no means confined to Mohammedans, but there can be no doubt that the only "necessity" of events is that of natural law or uniformity, a given thing invariably occurring in given conditions; and the true attitude is that of attempting, as best we may, to superinduce the conditions corresponding to the events we shall desire. We need to ascertain what ends we should aim at, and the means by which we may best strive therefor; to cultivate in ourselves and others the desire to aim at the proper ends by the proper means; and, finally, (we need) to secure for ourselves and others those conditions, or "environment," in which we may effectively indulge our proper desires to act according to our sufficient knowledge:—

"Vowed to emprise of death, 'gainst Dragons three—Fell Sir, blind Reason, and grim Fantasy—
Ride forth the PALLADINES, the Knights of Good,
To quell—would, they might slay—the noisome brood!"

Health, Wealth, Worth, and Knowledge are the essential and mutually interdependent elements of human welfare, and the things whose widespread presence we must promote. Individual action and also various grades of social action are in order to this end. Social action is either voluntary or governmental. Of the latter, THE INDEX notices "Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, and National Government for National Ends." The time is come to add: INTERNATIONAL Government for International Ends! Proper governmental action we cannot yet secure in any perfection, but THE REPUBLIC of which Clifford and other seers of this present age are dreaming is forming for the birth: "Let but the Commons hear this testament" left to us, Man, by our father, Man, and "the Parliament of Man, the Federation of the World," will sit and write decrees of righteousness and peace. Meanwhile, let us, by birthright citizens thereof, await its coming, not idly or destructively, but preparing, by sacrificing and hope-nerved effort hastening on the great advent. Voluntary social action we may even now organize efficiently. The cooperative phases of human effort are now recognized by law and endorsed by the latest science. I shall, if allowed, hereafter beg to offer practical suggestions for the campaign against Evil, in which I hope yet to serve with you and yours.

F. R. S. OF PROVIDENCE PICNIC.

The members and friends of the Free Religious Society of Providence, to the number of about seventy-five, passed a very pleasurable day Thursday last, at Halsey Farm, just below Silver Spring, on the Providence River. A delightful sail down the river, a shore dinner, and an indefinite amount of rambling on the rocks and through the woods were among the enjoyments of the occasion. Messrs. A. W. Stevens and John Wilson represented the Boston friends, and all, old and young, seemed to give back the smile with which Nature greeted them. Standing in the midst of such a scene, one could hardly help repeating with Lowell—

"Tis as easy now for the heart to be true
As for fields to be green and skies to be blue,
'Tis the natural way of living."

FOREIGN.

THE VILLAGE of Mariaweller, near Duren (Rhenish Prussia), proves to be a great field of debris of a Roman colony. A Roman villa has just been excavated there so that most of the apartments could be measured. An inscription in one of the rooms has not yet been deciphered. The Roman coins found date down to the fourth century.

"THERE HAS BEEN," we learn from the National Reformer, "a fresh outbreak of religious madness in the Connemara District, Ireland. Last week the mission school-house at Moyas was attacked by a mob. The windows were broken, the doors and school-presses destroyed, the Bibles thrown into the sea, and the Scripture-reader's wife and son assaulted."

AT KIEFF, RUSSIA, forty-nine persons have been charged with belonging to a secret association among the Tschigrin peasants. Five of the defendants have been sentenced to terms of imprisonment in the House of Correction, varying from two years and nine months to one year and seven months. One man was condemned to two months' imprisonment in a fortress.

THE GERMAN Anthropological Society holds its annual meeting at Strasburg, August 11, 12, and 13. The fifty-second meeting of the German Association of Naturalists and Physicians will be held at Baden-Baden from September 18 to 24. The French Association for the Advancement of Science will hold its eighth session at Montpellier, commencing on August 28. The president is M. Bardoux, late Minister of Public Instruction.

A MEMORIAL has been forwarded to the Lord-Lieutenant by the Bishop of Tuam from all the Protestant clergy of the district, in which they state that the protection which the government afforded by the prosecution of the Clifden rioters has not procured either a cessation of the outrages, or that security for life and property to which they are entitled. Their people, they say, have been since subjected to a series of cruel assaults, both the parents and children having been attacked and beaten while walking quietly.

MR. HOLYOAKE concludes an article in the Secular Review on Lord Beaconsfield as follows: "The humblest Chartist may stand up proudly in their presence (the party in power), for his party never swerved under indignity and imprisonment. Say what men will of Liberals, it cannot be said they had not honor. Earl Russell had a florid spirit; Wm. Gladstone a pride which no occupancy of place had tainted; Mr. Bright a dignity no ambition had bent to meanness. But of the phalanx of these 'stern unbending Tories,' only the names of Walpole, General Peel, Earl Carnarvon, and possibly Lord Stanley (the present Lord Derby), remain to awaken the old instinct of self-respect."

THE Patriot of Angers relates that an immense number of butterflies had been observed flying above a part of the city of Le Mail. They were travelling at a little distance from the earth, and inconvenienced persons walking in the streets. The same phenomenon was observed in Alsace, at Bismarck, on the 8th. At Bismarck they were so numerous that the light of day was obscured. Their color was red, in places tinged with gray. The commune of Wetzikon, in the canton of Zurich, was invaded by an immense swarm a kilometer wide that took two hours to pass. They flew from two to ten metres above the ground, and went off in a north-westerly direction. Swarms of grasshoppers had appeared in Armenia. At Elisabetopol, Russia, both banks of the river Kur were completely covered with them. All vegetation was devastated.

JESTINGS.

GO TO SEA in a canoe, if you seek wreckreation.—Detroit Free Press.

"MADAM," said a tramp on Cottage Hill, "would you give me an old pair of trousers, for I'm straving to death?"

WHEN Paul Boynton is married and settled, things will not go on so swimmingly with him, the New Orleans Picayune thinks.

MCGREGOR News: The weather is not only unreliable but unprincipled. Last Sunday it rained all day on a camp-meeting, and shone all day Monday on a circus.

"JEANNIE," said a stern old Scot to his daughter, "it's a very solemn thing to be married." "I ken that verri weel," responded Jeannie, "but it's a good deal solemnner not to be."

AT ST. ANNE'S SABBATH SCHOOL in Lowell, in answer to the question, "Which is the greatest church festival?" a little orphan of six years promptly responded, "The strawberry festival."—Cambridge Tribune.

"WHY," asked a governess of her little charge, "do we pray God to give us our daily bread? Why don't we ask for four days or five days, or enough to last a week?" "Because we want it fresh," replied the ingenious child.—Ottawa Herald.

EXTRACT from a feuilleton: "This blow was too much for the poor coat, whom so many emotions had broken down; he fell with his face upon the earth some instants after Domingo had finished his recital. When he arose he had ceased to live."

"SO YOU ARE going to keep a school?" said a young lady to an old maiden-aunt. "Well, for my part, sooner than do that I would marry a widower with nine children." "I would prefer that myself, but where is the widower?"—Vineland Independent.

"THIS FIVE DOLLAR gold-piece you gave me this mornin' is a counterfeit," said a vagabond to Rufus Choate. "I didn't give you a five-dollar gold-piece, my good fellow; I gave you a quarter." "You meant to give me a quarter, but you gave me this by mistake." "Oh well, then you may keep it for your honesty," said the caustic lawyer.

THE OTHER DAY a farmer met a friend in Detroit who asked him how prospects were out in the country. "This dry weather is just killing everything," was the doleful reply. Some hours afterward a storm of rain broke over the city, and as the farmer ran in and out of the wet his friend said: "This will do good out your way." "Maybe, maybe," said the farmer; "but it's mighty rough on them's got hay out to-day."—Detroit Free Press.

SCORE ONE FOR THE PROFESSOR.—A good story is told in Edinburgh about that genial Grecian, Professor Blackie. One day, shortly before the close of the late session, the professor being through some cause prevented from lecturing, there was posted on the Greek class-room door a notice to this effect: "Prof. Blackie regrets he is unable to-day to meet his classes." A waggish student, spying this, scraped out the initial letter of the last word of the sentence, and made it appear as if the professor was regretful at his inability to meet those fair specimens of humanity familiarly known outside the college quadrangle as the "lasses." But who can joke with Blackie? The keen-eyed old man, noticing the prank that had been played on him, quietly erased another letter, and left the following to be read by whom it might concern: "Prof. Blackie regrets he is unable to day to meet his asses."—Boston Traveller.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 TO THE INDEX ASSN., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEVENS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public assurance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.

 ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.
 JAMES E. OLIVER, Ithaca, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1875, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.20 for one year, including postage, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbathian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL OFFICERS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect, or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

SIFTINGS.

IT IS SAID THAT it is Moltke and not Bismarck who is the great man, after all, in German affairs.

THE WHEAT CROP is reported to be in a very bad condition all over Europe, owing to excessive rains, drought, and other causes.

DR. HOLMES says: "There never was a time when young readers were in such need of guidance" as at present. His answer to the question, "How shall we read?" is, "I believe in reading, in a large proportion, by subjects rather than by authors."

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH is nothing without ceremonies. One that appears to be much in vogue at present is "the blessing of the bells," whatever that may mean. It would be interesting to know in what respect the bells when "blessed" differ from ordinary ones.

CONVERSIONS do not always proceed in the same direction. An Episcopalian lady of Ohio, for example, was inducted lately into Judaism in Cincinnati. The ceremony was quietly performed, without ostentation, in a gentleman's parlor, in the presence of competent witnesses.

IT IS ANNOUNCED that the Pan-Presbyterian Council, which is to be held in Philadelphia next year, is to devote special attention to the discussion of the inspiration and authenticity of the Scriptures and the doctrine of future punishment. That looks like getting down to hard-pan in these matters.

THE FOLLOWING Spiritualist camp-meetings are announced: At Harwich, Cape Cod, beginning the 20th and closing on the 27th of July; Onset Bay from July 20th to Aug. 4th; Lake Pleasant from Aug. 6th to Sept. 6th. These meetings, we understand, are successful in all respects. They are attended by thousands.

THE RECTOR OF AN Episcopal church in Chicago advertises that the sermon in its services hereafter will last but twenty minutes. The music, which occupies nearly an hour, however, will not be abridged. It is doubtless well for the rector to consult the taste of the congregation in such instances. It is quite probable that his may be fonder of music than preaching.

IN HANS ANDERSEN'S Pictures of Travels occurs this passage in reference to the ruins of an abbey, which suggests the old-time life of seclusion and self-mortification of such abodes: "There, within that now poor garden, still blooms St. Bridget's leek, and once rare flowers. King John and the Abbess Ann Gylte wandered one evening there, and the King cunningly asked if the maidens in the cloister were never tempted by love; and the Abbess answered, as she pointed to a bird that just then flew over them: 'It may happen! One cannot prevent the bird from flying over the garden; but one may surely prevent it from building its nest there.'"

THE ENGLISH farmers are much depressed, as doubtless they have reason to be. What with their existing land-system, the accumulation of vast areas into the hands of a greedy aristocracy, the impouring of immense shipments of grain and beef and other American products into the country, the prospect is certainly far from cheering. In a recent debate upon the subject in Parliament, John Bright, in alluding to the advantages which America possessed as a competitor with European producers, and the consequent feeling which exists among English farmers, quoted this remark of one of them: "Well, do you know I wish that cursed country had never been discovered."

THE PROVISIONS of the munificent bequest of the late James Lick, the infidel millionaire of California, for the erection of an astronomical observatory on that coast, are being carried into effect. The preparatory work for the construction of the observatory has been begun. It will be erected on Mount Hamilton, and put in charge of Prof. S. P. Burnham, of Chicago, who is to make a special study of the atmosphere at that locality, in order to obtain the data requisite for the construction of perfect lenses for the great telescope. A temporary structure has been built, surmounted by a revolving dome. The telescope will be supplied with clock work, causing it to follow the movement of any planet it may be brought to bear upon.

WHAT FAVORED mortals are they who attend the Concord School of Philosophy! How delightfully must glide the summer hours in such fellowship! Now we comprehend the inducement for those of the barbaric world outside of Boston to be good so that they may come here when they die, it being understood that their reward is to include the privilege of attending the Concord lectures. It is pleasant to know the enterprise already gives full assurance of success. We understand it is one which Mr. Alcott has cherished for many years. The school is located in the former residence of Mr. Alcott, which is next to the Hawthorne Manse. The term is to last five weeks. The lectures will be on every day but Sunday, and are to be by A. Bronson Alcott on "Christian Theism," Mrs. E. D. Cheney on "History and Morality in Art," W. T. Harris, of St. Louis, on "Recent Philosophy," Dr. H. K. Jones, of Jacksonville, Ill., on "Plato," with special lectures by Dr. Bartol, Ralph Waldo Emerson, D. A. Wasson, T. W. Higginson, F. B. Sanborn, and others.

MRS. AUGUSTA WEBSTER'S essays on social topics, originally published in the London Examiner, have been collected in a volume. Mrs. Webster does not believe much in children's books about children. She thinks that as the most popular books with children, such as Robinson Crusoe, the Pilgrim's Progress, the Arabian Nights, and Gulliver's Travels were written for adults, it is a mistake to make little heroes and heroines in their teens, and to develop instead of repress the mental histrionism which is naturally common to children. "As soon as a child can read with pleasure she would allow such an one, with some slight reservation, the run of a library, only keeping out of its way such books as confuse right and wrong; and the little student will readily pitch upon something which will afford it much more amusement than a book specially written for the purpose, and will, at the same time, expand and strengthen its ideas. It is certain that those children are not usually either the happiest or the cleverest who have been the most liberally provided with the fashionable child literature of the day in which we live."

THIS IS THE WAY that Episcopal Bishop Cox feels about it. It is in regard to the proposed statue to Thomas Paine in St. Louis, which he characterizes in a late number of the Independent as "hyena worship," and goes on to say: "Here is an epoch in the history of fanaticism. There have been dog-worshippers and calf-worshippers and snake-worshippers. It is left for atheists on the shores of the Mississippi to out-Herod the superstitious of the Nile, to set up a hyena and cry: 'Such be thy gods, O Republic of America.' Paine was not an atheist; but he was, morally, a hyena. His habits, his features, and his character were those of this foul animal." There is a good deal of difference in taste among people, as well as in other things. We presume there are those who may think that the amiable and cultured Bishop has put it rather strong in this instance. It may be remembered that this is the same Bishop Cox who greeted Prof. Huxley in a similar strain and style of courtesy, because he ventured to profane his sacred diocese by attending at Buffalo the meeting of a scientific association. There is a tradition that the father of the Bishop once said, "May God Almighty forgive me for having a fool for a son." This may account for the Bishop's mental peculiarities.

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 28 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The Priests of the Sun.

A LECTURE DELIVERED BEFORE THE LIBERAL SOCIETY OF ALBANY, N.Y., AT THE MARTIN OPERA HOUSE, SUNDAY EVENING, APRIL 27, 1879.

BY HON. E. P. HURLBUT.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

Let us now return to Europe, and visit ancient Rome, the capital of the world, whose Emperor, Constantine, a worshipper of the sun up to his fortieth year, placed the Christian gods in his Pantheon, and finally established Christianity. The first bishops of this religion were all Jews, and most of the first converts were Pagans reared in sun-worship; for Rome borrowed from Greece, the latter from Egypt, and to Egypt Phœnicia had transmitted the doctrines, myths, and divinities of the religion of the sun. It was impossible that a religion entirely new should have been largely developed in Rome at that time. Like all religious growths, Christianity was necessarily engrafted on, and mixed up with, antecedent religious traditions, whose fables and doctrines had deeply impressed the minds of the age.

Christianity is an outgrowth, not of Judaism only, but of diverse other ancient sun-religions, with additional divinities and sacred fables. We have traced this accession of sacred fables from nation to nation in the sun-religions, and we have a case in our own age and country, in Mormonism, of a religious outgrowth from Judaism and Christianity, whereby "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints" has become an "institution." It has brought us another revelation, by our American sacred fabulist, Joseph Smith, and myriads of true believers, whose faith has not been surpassed, "no, not in Israel." The value of faith, however, is to be measured by the capacity of the swallow, and ignorance presents one that is unlimited.

I have shown that the chief Egyptian god, Osiris, was the sun, and that the main features of the sacred fable respecting him corresponded with the story of Jesus of Nazareth. I would add that the birth of the Sun, as personified in Osiris, was on the 25th of December, the same as assigned to the Christian avatar.

"On the 28th of December," says Higgins, "at the first moment of the day, throughout all the ancient world, the birthday of the god Sol was celebrated. This was the moment when, after the supposed winter solstice, and the lowest point of his degradation below our hemisphere, he began to increase, and gradually to ascend. At this moment, in all the ancient religions, his birth was kept. From India to the Ultima Thule, those ceremonies partook of the same character: everywhere the god was feigned to be born, and his festival was celebrated with great rejoicings." Here is seen the origin of our Christmas.

Adonis, Mithra, Crisna, Osiris, and the great sun-gods everywhere, were born on our Christmas day. This is remarkable, and calls for explanation; and who so ready as the priests to give it? They say that "it is not pretended that the 25th of December was the actual birthday of Jesus, but that it was adopted by the Church, the more readily to draw the Pagans to the true faith." Few things are easier than lying, and the Christian historian Eusebius, once wrote a paper to prove "how it may be lawful and fitting to deceive such as wish to be deceived." Now who does not wish to be deceived about Christmas? So they have got us there.

If Jesus is not a personification of the sun, why is he represented in paintings with the sun's rays making a halo round his head? Why did the heathen of Rome accuse the first Christians of being worshippers of the sun, and compel the early fathers to violate their consciences by making many a lying answer and apology? Why did the first bishops and converts, being Jews, change the Sabbath to the first day of the week, the day expressly dedicated to the sun by imperial decree?

All the great sun-gods that became incarnate upon earth, Osiris, Crisna, and the rest, were fabled to have been put to death,—most of them by crucifixion,—and all rose from the dead on the same day. The relation of the sun to the earth and other planets must have determined all this, and so the learned Godfrey Higgins says:—

"The history of the sun is the history of Jesus Christ. The sun is born on the 25th of December, the birthday of Jesus. The first and the greatest of the labors of the latter is his victory over the serpent, the evil principle or the devil. In his first labor, Hercules, the sun, strangled the serpent, as did Crisna, Bacchus, etc. This is the sun triumphing over the powers of hell and darkness, and as he increases he prevails, until he is crucified in the heavens, or is decussated in the form of a cross (according to Justin Martyr), when he passes the equator at the vernal equinox. But before he rises, he is dead for one day and about four hours. This is nearly the time necessary to be intercalated every six hundred years, to make the calculation come right. At the beginning of the third day he rises again to life and immortality. The twelve labors of Hercules (the sun) are his labors in passing through the signs of the zodiac, which are so similar to the history of Jesus Christ as to induce the reverend, pious, and orthodox Parkhurst to declare them types of what the real Saviour was to do and suffer. These celestial images are what induced the learned Alphonso the Wise to declare that the whole history of Jesus Christ might be read in the stars."

I think we may now assume that all the incarnate gods that have been fabled as visiting the earth are mere myths of the priests of the sun, and that the story of Jesus of Nazareth is not an exception, but that it is a rehash mainly of the sacred fables respecting Osiris and Crisna; and that, as a consequence, the Christian priesthood are but priests of the sun, and especially those who adhere to the Pagan ceremonies, dogmas, myths, and fables of the Church of Rome.

We have now traced the priests of the sun to the Christian era, and I think have gone far to establish that the Roman Christian priesthood were and are but modified priests of the sun, having every characteristic of the old sun-worshippers, with such outgrowth of sacred fable and dogma as suited the genius of the times. After some twelve or thirteen centuries of spiritual sway, the modern world sickened of their rule, and attempted a Reformation, not a blotting out, of the old Roman religion; and hence we have Protestantism as an outgrowth of the old Roman sun-worship, retaining the divinities of the old sun-religion, but abolishing some of its dogma, substituting new, and instituting different modes of church government. Protestantism is therefore but a sort of reformed sun-worship, and its clergy may properly be regarded as reformed priests of the sun.

Let us now briefly notice these two orders of modern sun-worshippers, and see what has been their influence in the history and destiny of our race.

The Romish priests of the sun distinguished themselves early, by making their fortunes out of an indifferent pun; but a sacred pun of course. It was written by an ingenious Greek in the New Testament, and if it had not been there originally, the talented fable-mongers of that era would have had no difficulty in interpolating it. Jesus is made to say to one whose name was Simon and whom he had surnamed Peter,—"which means a rock,"—"I say unto thee, thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church." So St. Peter became the foundation and head of the new Roman Church, and the old Pontifex Maximus, high-priest of the sun, descended to be his successor.

The new Church, then, appears as a composition of sun-worship and pun-worship; but if it commenced with a jest, it grew at length to be terribly in earnest. Let William Howitt be heard on this subject. He says:—

"Had the devil devised a system for himself, he could not have pitched on one like popery,—a system, which, pretending to be that of Christ, suppressed the Bible, extinguished knowledge, locked up the human mind, amused it with the most ludicrous baubles, and granted official licenses to commit all species of crimes and impurity. Satan himself became enthroned on the Seven Hills in the habit of a priest, and grinned his broadest delight amid the public and universal reign of ignorance, hypocrisy, venality, and lust.... The popes declared themselves the viceregents of heaven....

And after claiming infallibility for themselves and their conclave of cardinals, their first act was that which has been the practice of the priests of all countries, to shut up knowledge among themselves. . . . By every act of insinuation, intimidation, forgery, and fraud, they not only raised themselves to the rank of temporal princes, but lorded it over the greatest kings with insolent impunity. . . . Was a king refractory, did he refuse the pontifical demand of money, had he an opinion of his own, a repugnance to comply with papal influence in his affairs,—the thunders of the Vatican were launched against him; his kingdom was laid under the ban; all people were forbidden under pain of eternal damnation to trade with his subjects; all churches were shut; the altars were despoiled of their ornaments; the crosses, the reliques, the images, the statues of the saints, were laid to the ground, etc. . . . The clergy refused to marry, baptize, or bury; the dead were obliged to be cast into ditches, or lay putrefying above ground, till the superstitious people rose in rebellious fury, and obliged their prince to submit and humble himself before the proud priest of Rome."

Time has wrought wonders; the rock Peter has become rather disintegrated and quite shaky, and the last successor of Howitt's "proud priest of Rome" is now a timid householder in the Vatican. But between his proudest era and his humblest, what terrible things were done in the name of the modified sun-religion of Rome! The Inquisition, the Crusades, the war in the Netherlands, and the massacre of St. Bartholomew stand out as mountain-peaks of accursed iniquity, while the plains exhibit a state of morals and intelligence far below that of the principal pagan nations, the civilized predecessors of Christian Rome. There was no limit to bloodshed. The Spanish Inquisition alone dealt with some three hundred and fifty thousand victims,—about thirty-two thousand of whom were burnt,—and the victims of this institution all over the world are estimated at several millions.

It is true that there is one difference between the Roman priests of the sun and their oldest predecessors. Both orders roasted human beings in the fire; but the oldest priests ate them after they were "done brown," while the Roman priests cooked them till they were quite overdone, and thus threw away or wasted their sacred victuals!

But it was not alone in the tortures of the body that the Roman priests of the sun were a curse and oppression to mankind. They conspired to dwarf the human intellect, to keep it in darkness, and finally fell themselves into the gloomy pit of ignorance and the grossest illiteracy.

Mr. Hallam, the admirable historian of the Middle Ages, says, "An inconceivable cloud of ignorance overspread the whole face of the Church, hardly broken by a few glimmering lights, who owe almost the whole of their distinction to the surrounding darkness. In the sixth century the best writers in Latin were scarcely read; and perhaps from the middle of this age to the eleventh, there was in a general view of literature little difference to be discerned. . . . France reached her lowest point at the beginning of the eighth century, but England was at that time more respectable, and did not fall into complete degradation until the beginning of the ninth. . . . Of this prevailing ignorance, it is easy to produce abundant testimony. Contracts were made verbally, for want of notaries capable of drawing up charters, and these, when written, were frequently barbarous and ungrammatical to an incredible degree."

"For considerable intervals, scarcely any monument of literature has been preserved, except a few jejune chronicles, the vilest legends of saints, or verses equally destitute of spirit and metre. In almost every council the ignorance of the clergy forms a subject for reproach. It is asserted by one held in 992, that scarcely a single person was to be found in Rome itself who knew the first elements of letters. Not one priest of a thousand in Spain, about the age of Charlemagne, could address a common letter of salutation to another. In England, Alfred declares that he could not recollect a single priest south of the Thames at the time of his accession to the throne who understood the ordinary prayers, or could translate Latin into his mother-tongue. Nor was this better in the time of Dunstan, when it is said none of the clergy knew how to write or translate a Latin letter. The homilies which they preached were compiled for their use by some bishops, from former works of the same kind or the writings of the fathers. . . . I am not aware that there appeared more than two really considerable men in the republic of letters from the sixth to the middle of the eleventh century: John, surnamed Scotus, a native of Ireland, and Gerbert, who became pope with the name of Sylvester II.,—the first endowed with a bold and acute metaphysical genius, the second excellent, for the time when he lived, in mathematical science and mechanical inventions."

But you tire of this barbarism; so let us pass hurriedly on. You survey England casting off the high-priest of the sun at Rome, and enthroning her eighth Henry as king and priest. You see him engaged in killing his wives and murdering heretics. You know all about Luther, who said with characteristic politeness that "whoever declared that slavery was contrary to the law of God was a liar"; and to Calvin you have had an introduction by Col. Ingersoll. The sour, dyspeptic monk of Geneva is not an acquaintance you will wish to preserve, for you remember the terrible fate of Servetus.

In England you see the pious Chief-Justice Hale presiding over the death of witches and winding up his career by marrying his cook. You behold Europe so priest-ridden that men fled from her to the wilds of America; and here Cotton Mather and his Yankee Inquisition catches them, and you see Roger Williams running to Rhode Island for his life, Quakers whipped through the towns, and some, alas! and one woman, hung by the neck until they were dead. Hall, Oelrie! "Full of goodness, grace, and truth!"

And now, having taken a hasty view of the priests of the sun from their earliest appearance in Phenicia till they borrowed a new name in Rome; having observed their change of name without much improvement in their natures; and, passing along the stream of time, having encountered the storm raised by Luther and Calvin and seen the waters we navigated red with human gore,—we come at last to the era of Beecher and Talmage; of Joseph Cook, supplemented by Daniel Pratt, "the great American traveller," who is announced as about to give "open-air talks" on "The Universe of Evidences of Faith" (whatever that may mean); to the era of Archbishop Savings-Banks-of-the-Purse-sells, of Cincinnati, with the money of the poor invested priest-like in cathedrals and champagne; to an age of "words, words, words"; of much profession and slight performance; of Y. M. C. Asses; of pious forgers and godly bank robbers; and find, alas! that the most we have gained in point of morality is a serene and cool substitution of hypocrisy and fraud for force and murder.

Cervantes makes Sancho Panza say, "A good liver is the best preacher, and that is all the divinity I know." "Or need to know," replied Don Quixote. But some improvement there has been, for when we compare the state of church property under the Reformation with what obtained and still obtains in countries ruled by Rome, we have reason for congratulation. A commission was lately appointed in Italy to revise the taxes in the Papal States, and a report was made that the Church held six-tenths of all the landed property, three-tenths belonged to the principal families, and one-tenth belonged to the people! The property of the Church paid no taxes. It was lately reported that in the city of Puebla, Mexico, the value of all the real property is estimated at $22,000,000, and that held by the bishop of that city is put at $12,800,000, or considerably more than one-half. In the City of Mexico, the value of all the property is put at $50,000,000, and that held by the archbishop is put at $26,000,000. In other Mexican cities the proportions were not much different. But coming nearer home, we may find something to startle us. In 1870, in this State, it was estimated that the bishops held in their own names, in trust for the Pope, property valued at $80,000,000. It is said that nearly one-third of the city of Quebec and one-fourth of Montreal are held by the bishops of these towns. Property of the value of $18,000,000 is held by the Bishop of Baltimore. In Louisiana, the bishop controls over $10,000,000 of property. Trinity Church, in the city of New York, has many millions of real estate, but much of it pays taxes. The other property of the churches referred to escapes all the burdens of government. It is the old story repeated. The priests of all ages have clutched all that was to be had on earth, while they kept the eyes of their dupes fixed on heaven. Hall, Oelrie! "Full of goodness, grace,"—and real estate!

Let us turn for relief to something better: from consecrated ignorance, cruelty, and craft to light and beneficence; from the Inquisition to the schools of learning; from the priests of the sun to the teachers of science. About three hundred and twenty years ago was born Francis Bacon:—

"Him for the studious shade
Kind Nature formed; deep, comprehensive, clear,
Exact, and elegant; in one rich soul,
Plato, the Stagyrte, and Tully joined."

He made the circuit of all the science and learning of his time, rejected their errors, and, as Goethe said, "drew a sponge over the table of human knowledge." He declared that "man, the servant and interpreter of Nature, understands and does as much as he has actually or mentally observed of the order of Nature; he neither knows nor can do more." Thus he invited mankind to observe and question Nature, to treasure up the facts of their observation, and to draw their deductions from them. Thus he led the human mind to observation and experiment, which have given to our race their chemists, anatomists, physiologists, mental philosophers, geologists, and all the experts in natural science who have labored in these latter days for the advancement of knowledge.

Hence Priestley, who discovered oxygen, the great element of life, and which, though forming a very considerable portion of the earth, and without which animal life could not obtain for a moment, had never been revealed to the priesthood of any age or nation. But Priestley was a heretic in religion, his house was mobbed, his library and cabinet destroyed, and he had to flee to America for refuge.

Bruno, a cotemporary of Bacon, and who was actuated by his spirit, was a profound mathematician and natural philosopher; but he ridiculed the monks, and wrote in favor of Pantheism. He was imprisoned for two years by the priests of the sun, and finally burnt, but not eaten.

Galileo, also a cotemporary of Bacon, was a profound mathematician, astronomer, and natural philosopher. He held for naught all the monkish learning and scholastic rubbish of his time, and would substitute observation of the laws of Nature in their stead. He greatly enlarged the field of natural philosophy; but having adopted the Copernican system of astronomy, which he had verified by observation, he was denounced as a heretic who endangered the truth of the Bible; and the monks, who by this time had become so learned that they could write their homilies, preached against him, and finally he was given over to the Inquisition, which compelled him to renounce his theory of the motion of the earth; and for having risen from his penitential knees and said, stamping the ground, "Yet it does move," he was sentenced to the dungeons of the Inquisition for an indefinite period, and every week for three years he was compelled to repeat the seven penitential psalms of David! Thus did the priests of the sun protect their god from the annoyance of having this dirty little world running around him! But as Galileo said, it keeps on running, and Moses and the prophets must try to put up with it somehow!

Geology, a science of observation purely, first took imposing form under Sir Charles Lyell. He traversed Europe and America to discover how, in what time, and under the influence of what causes, the earth had assumed its present character and form. I have seen him exhibit a map of Ætna, drawn by himself on the spot, and heard him speak the next moment of coral reefs and islands which he had visited in the Northern Seas. He became the high-priest of the science he methodized and built up, and as it was supposed to contradict Moses, the priests of the sun belabored him long and well. But the modern mind moves, as well as Galileo's earth; and when Sir Charles Lyell died the Queen sent a wreath of flowers to be laid on his coffin, and Dean Stanley preached the funeral sermon, taking for his text the first verse or two of the first chapter of Genesis, "In the beginning," etc., and saying that the first two chapters of that book were not now accredited among the enlightened, and virtually gave them away, taking the revelations of geology in their stead! Yet no earthquake followed; the sun was not darkened, even in England; nor did the graves yield up their dead: but much faith was shaken, and an old dead cosmogony of the priests of the sun seemed to have been buried in the grave of the great geologist!

Among the teachers of science are to be found the great benefactors of mankind; and of their number has never yet been found a dealer in mystery, a persecutor, or foe to the rights, liberty, and happiness of his race. Among them was Harvey, who discovered the circulation of the blood, and Jenner, who revealed a preventive of the scourge of small-pox. Had the latter been a priest, he would have kept his discovery a secret, and used it to work miracles to astonish the faithful, and live lazily on their spoils.

Had our Franklin been a priest of the olden time, his great discovery of the identity of electricity and lightning, which was the wonder of his age, he would have kept a profound secret, and employed it to work miracles and confirm sacerdotal power with the ignorant; instead of which he cast about for some means of utilizing his discovery for the good of mankind, and, unfortunately for the peace of men living in rural districts, he suggested the lightning-rod. But Franklin "meant well." He was suspected of being a heretic in religion; and no wonder, for he invented a stove for which he refused to receive a patent lest some one should be deprived of the benefit of his invention.

Need I to remind you of Humboldt, one of the great high-priests of Nature? You cannot have forgotten the masterly and eloquent tribute lately paid to his memory by one of the most brilliant orators of our day. Humboldt embraced the entire of Nature in his grand survey, and lived but to bless his fellow-men with the vast treasury of his knowledge. He was wise, beneficent, and just, and neither had nor needed a redeemer.

But there is a group of scientists to which I wish more particularly to draw your attention, whose principal doctrines are called Darwinism. More than fifty years ago I had a glimpse of this theory from an old book called The Tell-tale, which was the name of the author reversed, that being De Maillet, who wrote in an age when heretics had to sneak to escape the vengeance of the priests of the sun.

The theory of this old book was, that the germs of all creatures on dry land existed in the sea, and, being there developed to a certain extent, they came on land, and, some surviving the change of element, grew at length by slow progression into land animals. As this author got up life from the elements of matter, and employed no outside workman, of course he was worthy to be burnt, and he may be roasting now for aught I know; but if so, what will become of Darwin and the rest?

My attention was next drawn to the "great Lamarck," as Haeckel styles the French philosopher, saying he and Goethe stand at the head of the great philosophers of Nature who first established a theory of organic development. Lamarck said in his philosophic zoology that "in the first beginning, only the very simplest and lowest animals and plants came into existence; those of a more complex organization, only at a later period. The course of the earth's development and that of its organic inhabitants was continuous, not interrupted by violent revolutions. Life is purely a physical phenomenon. All the phenomena of life depend on mechanical, physical, and chemical causes which are inherent in the nature of matter itself. The simplest animals and plants, which stand at the lowest point in the scale of organization, have originated and still originate by spontaneous generation. All animate natural bodies or organisms are subject to the same laws as inanimate natural bodies. The ideas and actions of the understanding are the motional phenomena of the central nervous system," etc.

This was a bold speculation for the time, and he went further and endeavored to prove the development of the human race from other primitive ape-like mammals. But Lamarck felt the want of Mr. Gradgrind, who said, "What we want is facts." These were presently forthcoming. After he wrote, geology rapidly advanced, and revealed embedded in the rocks the early forms of animal life, in such seeming regular progression that it was possible to build up a theory of the progressive rise and advancement of animal life from the newly revealed facts of that science. About thirty-five years ago, or a little more, a work was published anonymously in England and republished in New York, called Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation, in which all the suitable facts of geology and modern science were skillfully brought together to build up and illustrate the theory put forth by Lamarck.

The book was regarded by the priests of the sun as ungodly, and Wiley & Putnam, the American publishers, the former being an orthodox Christian, were taken to task by the clergy for putting it forth. It sold so well, however, that they did not like to forego the profit, and so they employed a doctor of divinity, totally destitute of science, to write down the work; and he wrote a slang-whanging paper, abusing the unknown author soundly, and calling him atheist, pantheist, and other naughty names: and putting this in front of the work, Wiley & Putnam issued another large edition, thus saving the curse of the infidel work and making money out of its sale, but neither compensating the abused author for copyright, nor apologizing for the abusive article attached to his work.

In England, the unknown author was sharply criticised by the North British Review, then the organ of the Free Presbyterian Church of Scotland; but the Review died, while the work survived to interest and instruct the thinking world, and kept alive the progressive theory of creation until there arose that great priest in the temple of Nature, Charles Darwin, who has proved by a world of facts, carefully observed by himself and modestly put forth, the main doctrines of his predecessors, and revealed new laws respecting the evolution of animal forms. The scientists of Great Britain, Germany, France, and America swell the train of his disciples; we see a host of deep and brilliant thinkers—Herbert Spencer, Tyndall, Huxley, Dubois, Raymond, Haeckel, and, in our own country, Draper, Marsh, Yeomans, and very many others—adopting and fortifying with additional facts and arguments this theory,—the only one that has hitherto appealed to observed facts in Nature to account for the organization of animal forms on this planet.

Now what is the matter with all this? Why, it will ultimately dispense with the cosmogony and theogony of the priests of the sun of all ages. It tramples upon all sacred myths and fables, and as a consequence dispenses with all ecclesiastical establishments whatsoever. It makes every man his own "prophet, priest, and king," and says to the hiring priest, "Nature is governed by law which you cannot alter by prayer; nor can you atone for injustice, or avoid the consequence of a violation of natural law by penitence or a redeemer. Your occupation is gone, and if you will instruct mankind further, you must become a teacher of science, loving truth rather than myth and fable, and address yourself to the bodies rather than the souls of men; to the affairs of this world, and not of any other."

But when science shall have silenced the priesthood, the people who have been their pupils so long will remain to be appeased. They exclaim to the men of science, as Mr. Mallock will have it, "You have taken away our God, and we know not where you have laid him!"

Now the teachers of science are by no means in accord as to this ravishment, except that it seems to be the prevailing opinion among them that, as they neither know, nor can know, anything at present on the subject, so properly they have nothing to say about it. Perhaps when all is known of Nature that it is possible for man to know, he will be able to give a satisfactory solution of this mighty problem; perhaps our race will have to await the slow process of evolution, whereby either greater brain-development or new faculties evolved may enable mankind to penetrate the screen of Nature which has hitherto concealed from their view the final cause of all.

At present, whoever positively affirms either that there is or that there is not a divine intelligence controlling the universe passes the limit of the human capacity to know, and must base the affirmation on blind faith, or the denial on bold presumption. The scientist seeks to know only what it is possible for him to know, examining cautiously and affirming modestly.

However, a denial of the existence of any or all of the divinities of the sun is not atheism, but only a denial of false gods and a step toward a purer and more rational religion.

But, say the disciples of the sun-priests, who have been taught that morals cannot exist without sun-worship, "You scientists have no basis for morality." It is true that they may not recognize any duties to God, since they neither know nor can know anything respecting him. Duty to God means duty to the priests, which duty means revenue. But there are left to them moral duties, proceeding from man's relation to known, tangible, sensitive beings by whom he is surrounded, and the scientist's system of morality begins and ends with these. Justice and kindness to all these, including the humblest forms of life, is all that can be asked of any man by any other man or animal. The rule of Confucius, laid down five hundred years before the Christian era or any "Christian gentleman" had robbed a bank,— "Do not that to another which thou wouldst not have done to thyself"—sums up man's moral duty so far as negation goes, and kindness and charity make up the rest; but these must be extended, as they are under that great friend of helpless creatures and dumb, innocent animals, Henry Bergh, to all our humble and harmless fellow-beings. Our modern naturalists teach us to respect, not only the rights, but the feelings, of all innocent animals.

As for moral precepts, the scientist, bound to no sect, ranges the whole earth for maxims of a moral kind. He learns from the ancient Buddhist a beautiful system of morals, extending to the protection of the life of the humblest animal. All life is one, and all innocent life equally to be respected; wherever there is sensibility, a moral duty arises in respect of it. All that is found in the sacred books of all peoples the scientist reads and considers, and whatever appears to be justified by the experience and common-sense of mankind as sound in morals he adopts in a catholic spirit, wherever it may be found. He rejects no book that is good, while he sees no reason to believe that any book has ever been written or dictated by any god.

But scientists are charged with destroying the hope of immortality, the great support and comfort of many minds, and the greatest consolation to families when death invades them and snatches one of their beloved from their arms.

It is however to be observed that here again scientists are not agreed as to a denial of immortality, and the only possibility of it seems to rest on one of the strongest affirmations of modern science; to wit, the indestructibility of matter and force. But the subject of immortality also seems to be beyond the reach of the human faculties at present, and whoever affirms most, probably knows least on the subject. He is led by hope, which—

"Springs eternal in the human breast."

One modern scientist, the unknown author of The Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation, in concluding his "explanations" addressed to all the critics of his work, holds the following language, with which I conclude this paper. He says: "It may be, as some one has suggested, that there is not only a term of life to the individual but to the species, and that when the proper time comes, the prolific energy being exhausted, man is transferred to the list of extinct forms. Strange thought!—that the beautiful phenomena of personal existence, the thrill of the lover, the mother's smile on cherub infancy, the brightness of loving firesides, the aspirations of generous poets and philosophers, the thought cast up and beyond the earthly, that petard which breaks down every door, the tear of penitence, the meekness of the suffering humble, the ardor of the strong in good causes, all that the great and beneficent of all ages have felt, all that each of us now sees and muses on in his home, his people, his age,—that all these should be thus resolved, passing away whole 'equinoxes' into the past as far as we particular men are concerned, still passing further back as respects the larger personalities called nations, and still further in inconceivable multiplication with regard to the species,—gone, lost, hushed in the stillness of a mightier death than has hitherto been thought of!"

"But yet the faith may not be shaken: that which has been endowed with the power of godlike thought, and allowed to come in communion with its Eternal Author, cannot be truly lost. The vital flame which proceeded from him at first returns to him in our perfected form at last, bearing with it all good and lovely things, and making of all the far-extending past but one intense present, glorious and everlasting."

THE CONCORD SCHOOL.

A SYMPOSIUM OF THE CONCORD PHILOSOPHERS.

When the Concord Summer School of Philosophy opened, a week ago to-day, there was a feeling of uncertainty as to the success of its practical workings. It had a good number of scholars from the start, and there were ample reasons for predicting a favorable term; but the plans had not been tried. The end of the first week, however, finds that a more satisfactory result has been reached than was expected at the outset. On the first day, about fifty scholars had sent in notice that they would be present. To-day there are sixty, and others, particularly from the West, are known of who will attend before the term is far advanced. Not that these sixty attend every lecture, but so many in all will attend some or other of the course. If the interest should be sustained through the entire course, and be lively at the end, it is probable that the school will be reopened next year, and if it is then successful it may become a permanent institution. A simple form of proceeding is followed at the daily lectures. Just as church people drop into a vestry for an evening prayer-meeting, so these philosophers and students drop into the parlor in Mr. Alcott's house. Each one is expected to occupy the same seat at successive lectures. They come in, sit quietly, with an occasional whisper, till five minutes after the appointed hour, following the custom of some colleges in giving a short grace to the students to save them from a tardy mark. It would be absurd to say they are called to order; they are in the strictest order already. The presiding officer—generally Mr. Emery—simply informs the lecturer that it is five minutes after the hour of beginning.

Yesterday forenoon was occupied by the Rev. Dr. H. K. Jones, of Jacksonville Ill., upon his favorite subject, "Platonism." He is inclined to find in the "Apology," which was the theme of discussion, something more than the mere surface account. He would regard it also in the light of an allegory, Socrates being a representative of the human soul, and the Athenians being another term for the human passions. The forenoon's conversation was much enjoyed by the members present. At three o'clock came the lecture by Professor William T. Harris, of St. Louis. His subject was the same as that announced on the first day, "The Personality of the Absolute." To-morrow Professor Harris will read a paper summing up the result of his argument for the personality of God up to its present stage. Thursday he will take up the question of the immortality of the soul, and on Friday the subject will be physiological psychology, or what can be got by observation of the brain, in which he will consider the limits to the modern investigation of the brain. Yesterday's lecture was in the regular course of the proof of the personality of the absolute, and had frequent mention of pantheism and its consequences in human life. At the beginning Professor Harris reviewed the heads of his preceding lectures,—the several kinds of fate in the natural world and in the life of man, and the kinds of necessity,—the subjective which requires that the person shall think a particular thing, the objective necessity that the thing shall be as it is, and logical necessity which we find in a definition by which something is involved in something else.

When Professor Harris had gathered up the threads of thought which he left at the end of his preceding lecture he went on with his advance lesson. The idea of God which man defines for himself is his theory of the origin and destiny of the world; the whence and the whither of Nature. If a man believes that the supreme principle which he calls God is blind fate, or unconscious force, or something devoid of intelligence and will, this belief will modify his thoughts and ideas and shape them to harmonize with his faith. If he regards it as conscious personality, this view will shape his ideas and produce a radically different result from the former principle. The former is unfriendly to the persistence and triumph of human beings or of any rational beings whatever, either as a principle or as a ground of hope. It will not account for the origin of conscious being. Still less can this principle permit the persistent existence of conscious individuals, for that would admit consciousness to be higher up than unconscious being. Even if a conscious individual could come from an unconscious first principle, it would be a finite and temporary phase. The activity of the first principle—and all explanation of the first principle must regard it as active—must be in accordance with its own nature. It must continue to shape all consciousness to correspond with its nature. It gives rise to modifications of its acts (which are its expressions) and again multiplies the expressions it previously caused. The action of an unconscious principle would be in the direction of a continued obliteration of consciousness. A conscious principle would tend to elevate unconscious beings into consciousness, and beings raised to consciousness would be sustained there and not allowed to lapse into unconsciousness. All things would conspire together to keep them in consciousness. The tendency of a concrete absolute would be to sustain beings at the highest point of concreteness; but if the highest principle were abstract, the tendency would be to become abstract. An unconscious absolute may create unconscious beings and destroy them without sensation. What does it matter to them? But to any rational beings such blind fate is utterly hostile and repugnant. The struggle for existence is a conscious struggle. An unconscious first principle is absolutely destructive to triumph in the struggle for supremacy in the world. Hence, with a belief in an unconscious absolute, rational beings find themselves in the worst possible position. Pessimism becomes their only creed. Whatever is calculated to foster human development must have only one result,—to increase pain; for the destruction of a conscious individual is attended with pain. And the struggle to gain consciousness, the struggle to be something, is an agonizing striving accompanied with pain. No one rises without a hard struggle and great pain. It is so in the appreciation of art. One must get rid of the narrow ideas he picked up in childhood. A man is not born in New England with an appreciation of Greek art. It is a severe struggle for a man to purify himself in his moral nature. If the first principle is unconscious, the struggle is in the wrong direction. The ultimate victory of the unconscious would remove, one by one, every trace and result of the victory of the conscious, and with great pain would reduce the conscious to the unconscious state.

With varying degrees of distinctness the nations of Asia are pantheistic, with more or less of an unconscious first principle. In Europe the principle is believed to be conscious. Philosophy attempts to show the rational necessity for a first principle. Religion assumes the first principle to be conscious, and shows the necessity of conforming the human life to its requirements and to its supreme activity. The philosophical view of the existence of the first principle is that of a far advanced stage of individual development,—a view shared by a few individuals at most, but approached by all. Men live and die without seeing the necessity for a first principle. It is a popular idea that things exist independently; that the world is a collection of separate units. But nothing is isolated; there is an interdependence of everything. To the eye of science each thing is a part of the totality. Before things, there were forces greater than in things. Things perish by the destructive forces. Likewise there are interdependent forces which have their correlation, and behind them what is called persistent force. There is no particular force, though its activity gives rise to all particular forces. It is all force, though in its activity it takes no particular form.

Philosophically, the first reflection is at the same stand-point as the religion of Central and Eastern Asia,—that of pantheism or unconscious absolute. With it are the isles of the sea. Those nations do not feel the necessity of an absolute first principle. They represent a world of spirits behind the visible world. Corresponding to the fetishism of the heathen nations is the individual limitation of faith by sense of perception. Philosophy begins by setting up a first principle, and it selects one of the principles of the world. It may be of the natural world, as water, air, or fire, or it may be a more adequate one, as the "nous," the good, the pure, or the ego. What has been said regarding pessimism in pantheism suggests the question what effect on the human mind it will have. Philosophy, in setting up a first principle, does for the individual what religion does for the people. The conditions of life are generic, not individual. A man cannot safely practice what his fellow-men regard as wicked and immoral. The first principle in the world transcends all the things in the world,—church, state, and family. To the philosophic conception of the first principle as unconscious the Asiatic principle is more kindred than the Christian religion. The conviction of the modern pantheist is negative. He would remove religious restraints, but does not look into the future to see what he must do when the restraints are removed. The intellectual problem of the age is now to bring the scientific view into harmony with the religious faith, to elevate that view to a personal theism. The rational problem is to show that under the pantheistic view lies the doctrine of the conscious absolute as already presupposed. The question of the whence and the whither underlies all questions as to the right or wrong direction of deeds or events. The standard of judgment is determined by it. The practical results of pantheism are destructive to all forms of human activity. It checks the exertions of those who take a gloomy view of the final end of things. Its effects are largely to produce despair in the minds of intelligent people who belong to the strata which look to people above them for direction.

Professor Harris mentioned the view of human life in Dante, in George Eliot's novels, in Shakespeare, and dwelt at some length upon Goethe's Faust. The triumph of the conscious absolute, which is impossible in the first part, is revealed in the second only in a higher realm of existence. The Dante of modern times, he said, is our own Hawthorne, in his pictures of the struggles of the human soul.

The chief characteristic of pantheism in modern times is nescience. Sir William Hamilton, in bringing over the antinomies of Kant, was to be followed necessarily in a short time by Herbert Spencer, who carries the doctrine to pantheism. The argument is: We cannot know the infinite because we cannot conceive it. We have only a negative idea of the infinite. The attributes of personality are finite and necessarily incompatible with the infinite. Hence the infinite is not a person. If we take only the first premise, the conclusion follows that the infinite is not a person. When God is conceived as a pure naught we have arrived at pantheism. Then force transcends personality and ambition; conscience and feeling are lost. But the doctrine is sophistry. It is the same as that of the universality of Vishnu; it has the idea of persistent force which swallows up everything. Even the gods cannot have an individuality against Brahma in the Brahminic religion. In the Orient, religion is pantheistic. This doctrine is not much different from the unknowable of Spencer. It is the unknowable, because the abstracting analysis has taken everything out beforehand. All determinations have been abstracted from the first principle. In the attempt to conceive the unknowable, properties must be thought and all properties have been taken out. It is a very simple game.

Remarks after the close of the lecture were offered by Mr. Alcott and others, but the questions were not put at first. Soon, however, they were put with more freedom, and the conversation was full and instructive. It was confined to topics suggested by the lecture, and the pupils found their instructor amply competent to satisfy their inquiries.—Boston Advertiser, June 22.

PHILANTHROPIES.

A correspondent of the Christian Register, in a recent letter from New York, sends this report of good deeds in that city:—

"The Midnight Mission, for the rescue of unfortunate women, is now beginning to show excellent results. There is a small private mission on the west side carried on by a devoted woman, and sustained principally by a wealthy gentleman and his wife. The methods which have rendered this small mission fruitful have been adopted by the larger one. A pleasant home and some light labor are provided for the women, who enter voluntarily and become as one family. A quiet, sheltered retreat, sympathy, and kindness are the agencies employed in their reform. Between two and three hundred have been received into the home during the past year, of whom thirty-three went away and thirteen were dismissed. The remainder have been provided with situations, or have returned to their friends. This mission takes hold of the saddest problem of life in great cities. Enough has been done to show that these hapless women can only be saved by love and the most tender and delicate consideration of their needs. . . .

"Two cargoes of happy little children have been sent down for a week's vacation each, at the summer home of the Children's Aid Society. The little ones are just out of babyhood, none being taken over seven years of age, and many of them have enjoyed their first peep at the blessed country, so beautiful in its green drees. During their stay at the home, they enjoy the utmost freedom compatible with kindness and good manners, and store up a little vigor to resist the exposure of the tenement houses to which they must return all too soon."

THE FLOWER MISSION.

Tuesday the monthly meeting of the Flower and Fruit Mission was held at the room in our City Hall, and in this connection it is worth while to relate briefly the story of the origin of this truly charitable work. It is wholly a woman's idea; conceived, begun, and extended by a woman, until it promises to be of universal consequence. Even those who are so far behind the times as to be shocked at women's voting can approve and aid this mission. It is ten years since it was first established in Boston. A young woman, teaching in that city came in daily from her home in one of the suburbs bringing flowers, and was met all along by little children begging for just one; and she noticed also that older eyes looked lovingly at her treasures. Later in the season she visited a friend in whose garden quantities of fruit decayed because there was no one to eat it. Then it was that the thought flashed into her mind how excellently the surplus of fruits and flowers might be employed among the poor and sick of the city. She consulted friends, and among them were some practical clergymen who helped to make her idea effective. This was the beginning of a remarkable work; Hollis Street Chapel was chosen as the depot for the flowers, and everybody was most ready to help. People gave with real pleasure; the railroads charged no freight, the expressmen gave their services, and women were abundantly found to arrange and deliver the flowers. The year following the Boston experiment, similar missions were opened in New York and Cambridge. Since then their example has been followed by Philadelphia, St. Louis, Chicago, Indianapolis, Pittsburg, Detroit, Cincinnati, Brooklyn, Salem, Louisville, and Springfield in this country. There are two such missions in London with eight depots in the city; others in Hull, Liverpool, Edinburgh, Leeds, Glasgow, and Bristol. Letters have been received from Australia and Holland, asking for instructions to carry on the missions; and only a short time ago the young woman who began all this received a letter from a lady in France, requesting reports and methods of work, as it was desired to establish the same thing in Lyons and other French cities. Through the efforts of young women who became interested in our mission while visiting in this city, similar missions have been started in Rochester, N.Y., and Norwich, Ct. In a place like Springfield, where the love of flowers is so universal that nearly every little plot has something blooming, the mission becomes something more than a mere "charity." Its gifts are tokens of real sympathy for all who from sickness or other reasons are brought to its notice. Certainly this thoroughly beautiful and beneficent idea deserves support, and cannot but have it from every one to whom it is presented.—Springfield Republican.

ABSORBING REFORMS.

We have observed with much interest of late that Mr. Adler, and other radical leaders, in a similar strain appeal to free religionists and all moral teachers to labor in the cause of reform, and give battle for the right, citing the example of Jesus and other great reformers as worthy to be followed in striking blows against the wrongs and shams of to-day, as they did against those of their day; while at the same time there are those who, acknowledging the greatness of what has been done in the past, yet deny the existence at this time of any great object of reform worthy the absorbing activities of philanthropists. If this be true, why these exhortations from earnest men? Let us see; and we will preface the brief examination with the words of a lady in California: "While Boston is absorbed with philosophy and literary and artistic culture, California is discussing the great living and practical questions of the day,—the new constitution, the Chinese, and capital and labor," etc. The latest sensation in the newspapers, of so-called iniquity, is to the effect that a poor man who had no work and no means of support for his three little children (girls, we believe) murdered them in the hope that they would thus go direct to heaven, whereas, if left on earth, he saw no hope for them above going to the bad, in the footsteps of so many other destitute girls.

A laboring man, the other day, expressed to us his earnest conviction that the question of labor and capital at present was of higher importance than that of slavery in the past, because the victims are more sensible of their degradation than were the blacks of the South, and the fact that want and squalid poverty, from the dearth of employment, exist in this country side by side with luxury, pampered indulgence, and waste.

Another great and important question for discussion and reform is the rearing of a higher, a holier, and more responsible parentage. One need only to walk, especially on Sunday, through certain streets of this city, where the squalid condition of countless numbers of little children speaks volumes on the degradation of the parents, while the faces of those of a somewhat larger growth, reminding one of a beer-mug with a cigar or pipe for a handle, make one hopeless for the probable future. And again, among the better classes of people,—with all seriousness and reverence be it spoken,—we question how many parents there are who have any higher ideals than to make playthings and pretty things of their precious babes, as though they were mere dolls! This subject, also, is one of the difficult problems of the day, and we dismiss it, seeing a gleam of sunshine and hope in the fact that so many earnest women are knocking for admission into the medical profession, and through whose kindly offices a change for the better may in time be effected.

The temperance movement, so hedged about with selfishness, sensual indulgence and crime, degradation and misery of every gradation and form,—who can estimate its importance on the future destiny of mankind? Who can say that it is second in interest to the anti-slavery movement; that the poor degraded victims of intemperance and their children are not doomed to a deeper slavery than the blacks of the South ever suffered? While recognizing the differences, and that much of reform in these cases may be effected individually, we still feel that these are worthy objects for absorbing thought and activity by philanthropists.—Jane Greene, in Commonwealth.

BLOATED BONDHOLDERS.

Political demagogues, with more brass than brains, have for years loudly denounced as "bloated bondholders" all prudent men who have carefully saved a portion of their earnings, and invested the same in government securities. It never has entered their thick heads that all bonds or other property had to be bought and paid for with money. Now we ask these orators to give us their views about the present scramble for government certificates by the tens of thousands of "poor people" who throng the doors of nearly all the leading post-offices of the country. They have denounced the rich for buying bonds: now what will they say about the poor,—the men, women, and even children, who may now be properly classed as "speculators" in government securities? Three fourths of the sales of certificates, we believe, are made to the poor for speculative purposes; i.e., they are bought in order to make money, to secure an immediate profit on the purchase.

Our readers will understand that we don't condemn those, rich or poor, who are now investing money in sums of from ten to one hundred dollars in government certificates. They do right, whether they buy them to keep or to sell. It is a safe business, and it is none of our business what the owners of these securities do with them. But let us hear no more bosh, in Congress or elsewhere, about bloated bondholders; for they include all classes,—the rich and the poor. From one end of the nation to the other we now see the poor frantically flocking to the post-offices and other public places, and literally fighting their way to the counters of the government agents, in order to get one or more of these four-per-cent. certificates. We are glad to see these sales to people in moderate circumstances. We are glad to see the rich and the poor thus meeting together and competing with each other in making investments on equal terms. We believe the course of the government in offering these certificates to the people directly is one of the shrewdest and wisest financial movements ever made. Indeed, we believe that hereafter all our government loans will be negotiated with the people direct, and at the lowest figures known in any country on the globe.—San Francisco Commercial and Advertiser.

TRUE WORSHIP.

BY LEWIS G. JAMES.

God spake, too, when the teacher said:
"Unto these little ones faithful be;
Clothe them and give them their daily bread:
Thus shalt thou minister unto me."

Not by loud anthems is He praised best
Whose infinite life no mind can ken,
But by loving words and deeds, addressed
Here on earth to our fellowmen.

What cares He for our names and creeds,— Atheist, Theist, or Orthodox?
Souls are judged by their daily deeds:
Doing the deed of heaven unlocks.

Not that heaven in some distant star,
Paved with gold, and with pearly gates,
But heaven right here, where our fellows are Needing the blessing our love creates.

What does He care for your bended knees,
Or the names you give to Him in your prayer?
Pray in true acts, for prayers like these Return in blessedness unawares.

Little will help the craven fears,—
The selfish strivings our souls to save,—
The pious pretence of prayers and tears
That cover the character of the knave.

One thing only endures the test,
The perfect blessing of God secures;
Always of two ways choose the best:
Thus the secret of heaven is yours.

Though you may never name His name,
Or seek His heaven as the preachers do:
Follow the Truth, and all the same
Heaven will surely come to you.

Then shall ye know that worship true
Is not in posture, or prayer, or looks,
Nor mumbling of creeds, as churchmen do,
Nor "vain repetition" from sacred books.

But who is a man, whole, sane, and true,
Who serves his fellows in age and youth,
Is one with Him and the sacred few
Who worship in spirit and in truth!

The Index.

BOSTON, JULY 31, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLKIN Office, No. 33 MONROE STREET: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being 'as the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns.' This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

REQUISITIONS!

It has been insisted that rationalism in planning and entering upon the great constructive work before it, should first of all seek to understand itself. Its condition is at present, if we may be allowed still another simile for the purpose, much like that which is described in Genesis as the primitive one of physical things. It is very largely in a state of chaos. It is unquestionably illuminated with a light of which the past witnessed but little if any. Still darkness broods upon its face, which is as yet, to no small extent, without order or form. We have seen that certain things are essential to the fullest conservation of its energy, its effectiveness and progress. These are a comprehensive unity; a more rigid application of reason to the diverse conceptions and theories that pass under its name; and a moral standard which shall, in this particular at least, silence its opponents and command the general respect. If radicalism cannot attain this, it may as well abandon the hope of becoming a grand, consolidated, preponderating movement.

It must continue to be the receptacle of all sorts of crude vagaries and egotisms and incoherent and isolated forms of iconoclasm, but cannot expect very much beyond this. The Church will still be, as it has been all along, master of the situation.

The fundamental principles of radicalism which we have indicated will call into requisition certain auxiliaries indispensable for the promotion of its general aims. Two or three of the more obvious of these were named, and dwelt upon at some length, by Prof. Felix Adler, in his recent address before the Free Religious Association in Boston. They commend themselves so strongly to us, and are in such perfect accord with our views of the present demands of rationalism, that we will here refer to them, trusting thus to help emphasize their importance, and concentrate thought and attention upon them.

1st. Then we need a higher type of standard-bearers or teachers for our cause. We need those who can not only tear down but build up as well; who have other powers, and in equal measure, beside those of denunciation; whose vision is of sufficient scope to discern not only that which should be discredited and is false, but that which is good and true and worthy to be preserved wherever it may be; persons who shall be able to see which are the larger and which the things of lesser account, and thus, instead of consuming their energies upon unavailing pursuits and mere incidental and profitless issues, give them to those which are of vital and primary importance. To possess such teachers, we must seek those of high intellectual training, who must be thoroughly equipped and accredited for their work. Radicalism must become more than a field for a free fight for those whose sole delight and ambition is in such exercise. It must call for those who will not be content to play upon the prepossessions, prejudices, and aversions of others for selfish benefit; whose rationalism can present other claims for its merit and acceptance than its remoteness from ordinarily received opinions. This is a kind of rationalism necessarily more or less inherent in the incipient and unsystematized stage of such a movement. Nor is it, crude and undisciplined though it be, altogether useless or devoid of honor. Nay, it is often associated with great nobleness of purpose and the very soul of heroism. But, though this must be admitted,—that good may come in some degree through such a mode of procedure in the transition to a new era,—the aggregate results are likely to prove, if not small, certainly inferior in quality to what they ought for the force expended. But the time comes when such a movement, if it is to go forward rather than exhaust itself and perish of its superabundant energy, demands other men and methods.

Rationalism has reached such a point in this country at least. The time has come when scepticism and infidelity—we use the terms without the abhorrence or sense of their dire forebodings they sometimes awaken—are witnessed everywhere. They penetrate all systems, forms, and classes of society. There is scarcely a village or hamlet in the land that has not its freethinker. People have lost or are rapidly losing faith in their teachers and the creeds in which their lives have been spent, even when they render an outward deference to them. They are longing for solutions to the great problems of life and duty which they do not supply. They want something more than simply to be shown the unreasonableness of the doctrines they have been accustomed to receive. This they see, to no small extent, clearly enough themselves. They want a new philosophy of life, a new religion, if we may call it by that name; not criticism and dissent alone, or mere intellectual theorizing. Though rationalism cannot discard these, but must ever retain them as constituting one of its essential characteristics, they are things upon which no soul can wholly thrive or develop up to its best estate. There is a yearning for that which is more comprehensive and radical in its trust sense; for that which shall touch even deeper springs of being, more thoroughly quicken and appeal to the whole nature, bring into play and direct all its parts to lofty purpose for the ennobling of the individual life, its perfection and culture, and the service of the race.

But to procure persons who shall be sufficient for these things; to stand at the head of the new movement and perform such a work as that indicated; able to combat with unanswerable logic and learning the false theories of religion and philosophy, even on their strongest side, and to show their fallacy and the higher and better truth; able also to tellingly assail the false usages and customs and hoary wrongs of society, and lead the way to its reconstruction on principles of justice and righteousness,—there will be needed facilities for the training and efficient equipment of those who are to undertake these tasks superior to any which now exist for a correspondent purpose.

In other words, we shall need schools in which they may be properly fitted for the successful prosecution of such a work. Those which exist, even the best endowed and most liberal, fail to answer to its imperative requirements. They are all more or less committed to and implicated in traditional conceptions and methods. They all exist for the propagation—in some less or greater degree—and support of certain foregone conclusions,—conclusions for the most part which in the light of the more advanced knowledge and intelligence of to day are no longer tenable in the sense in which they are held. These schools, theological or divinity, called by whatsoever name they may be, are for the exclusive advancement of a single limited, inadequate, and more or less obsolete system of religion, and a single sect even of that system. To this they are tethered, and are thereby incapable of that inclusive expansiveness, freedom, breadth of sympathy, and force in practical directions which is necessary to enable them to evolve and represent the religion of humanity. Rationalism needs, then, a school for the adequate preparation of those who are to be the exponents of its principles and application of them to human culture and welfare,—the preachers and teachers of the new era. Such a school, if it were opened to-day, would not wait long for persons ready to enter it. There are many young men in our colleges and divinity schools, we believe, who would be eager to embrace the opportunity, were it offered. The preacher's vocation would assume a new attractiveness and power, and the apathy, indifference, and disbelief which now possess in so large a degree the minds of men and women in society would be displaced by a strong and earnest faith in duty and truth. Its extravagance, sensualism, and sordid money-getting spirit would be diverted into channels of more self-satisfying and worthy activity for the service of their day and generation. In the next number of THE INDEX we shall speak of still other equipments that are needed for the work of the rational movement.

METHOD OR RESULTS?

The question is sometimes asked whether the Free Religious Association stands for a method or for results; for a certain mode of investigation in religious matters or for certain conclusions concerning religious problems which that method may reach.

As usual in answering a question, everything must here depend upon the meaning of the terms. If we were shut up to the alternative which the question presents and could not say that the Association stands for both method and results, and were allowed no explanations, it would certainly be safer and more correct to say that it stands for a method,—for the method of absolute free inquiry in religion; for this is the one central and dominant principle of the Association,—that it applies the scientific method of impartial and unfettered reason to all religious problems, having no assumptions of any authoritative revelation to begin with, whether Christian, Hebrew, or any other. The Association aims to promote morality and philanthropy, or the practical part of pure religion; it strives to strengthen fellowship in the spirit of good aspirations and good efforts; but it has always distinctly and emphatically declared that no set of beliefs, whether called by the Christian or any other name, should be a condition of membership. No scientific association has ever more stringently guarded the right of its members freely to investigate all questions, and to form their own opinions amenable only to reason. This, then, is the special and distinguishing meaning of the Association in the history of religion,—that it stands for the free and complete application of all the tests of reason to all the problems of religion; which is the scientific method, precluding, of course, at the outset, that the Association should be specially Christian or defined by any other particular religious faith.

But a method is useful because it leads to results. There is no special virtue in a method simply as a method. A method is only a road, good because it leads somewhere, or because it serves some useful end. And the Free Religious Association would hardly have been worth the forming if it had only been proposed that it should play with its method of free inquiry, and it had not been seriously believed that this method would in time most profoundly affect the creeds and organizations of the religious world. It was because those who formed the Association saw that the method would accomplish this very end that they thought it desirable to have the Association. As the scientific method has been fruitful of grand results in the domain of the physical universe, giving us a new philosophy of its creation and existence, so the same method will most certainly bring new light into the realm of religion, and reconstruct men's ideas concerning its origin, growth, and continuance. The method is directly opposed to the old and still habitual ecclesiastical method applied to religion,—that of supernatural authority,—and it must bring correspondingly different results; namely, a class of beliefs that will in time come to be regarded as rational settled conclusions concerning man's religious nature and history, answering in a sense to the settled conclusions of science concerning the physical world. It would not be difficult to state already some of these conclusions, in which there would be general agreement among persons who adopt and adhere to the method.

Does the Free Religious Association then have a "creed" to propagate? By no means. For though it does stand for results as well as a method, for the results which are the natural and necessary consequence of its method,—nobody has any authority to formulate these results and impose them as beliefs upon others. Moreover, reasonably certain as these results may be, they are by the very conditions of the method that produced them always open to such modification as may be caused by any new discovery of facts or more correct analysis and understanding of old facts. In this respect the Association stands precisely in the attitude of any scientific association. With all the differences that exist among scientific men on problems not yet settled, there are certain beliefs accepted by all scientific men as practically conclusive. Yet no scientific body thinks of imposing these upon its members or upon any other people any farther than enlightened reason itself imposes them. This is a matter that in the domain of science takes care of itself. So in the Free Religious movement. While the method that controls the movement doubtless tends to certain definite and positive results, each individual in the movement will state and advocate these results in his own way, accountable only to the laws of human reason.

And those people who still adhere to the old method of supernatural authority in religion have from the first had an instinctive presentiment that the Free Religious Association adopted a method so different from theirs that it must needs lead to different results from theirs; and hence, in spite of the efforts to secure a representation of them in the meetings and on the platform of the Association, they have with rare exceptions held aloof from it: while the Association from the outset has been necessarily officered by those who believe in the new method and are willing to trust it for whatever results it may bring. That the method will not leave to the religious world the same results that were entertained as convictions five centuries ago, is as clear as that within that time the progress of natural science has changed the beliefs of enlightened men concerning the physical world.

A WORD FOR LIBERTY.

There is a class of men, constituting what is called a learned profession, whose bread and butter depends on the slavery of the mind. To them, free souls are dangerous. I am speaking of the class, not of its exceptional men. It is this class which makes it dangerous in this country to speak what one thinks, provided he thinks what this class of paupers does not approve.

It is more than a hundred years since Benjamin Franklin said a religion which does not support itself is not worth having. That is a self-evident truth. Yet by exemption of church property from taxation, religion is really dependent on the State in 1879. And this great omnipresent pauper, having by false pretences procured of the politicians a law against liberty, is now holding in prison a perfectly innocent man!—is remonstrating with the President against his liberation!

What is the crime of D. M. Bennett, editor of the Truth Seeker? All that is alleged against him as a crime, and for which he has been sentenced to thirteen months in the Albany Penitentiary, is that he mailed a copy of a small pamphlet alleged to be obscene and indecent, and on that account unmaillable by the law aforesaid. Now the pamphlet is one which is possessed, sold, and given away openly, under State and municipal laws against obscenity which are sufficiently stringent. In Massachusetts, where the author of this so-called criminal pamphlet lives, no prosecuting officer can be found fool enough to meddle with him or any one who buys or keeps his pamphlet, for the plain reason that his pamphlet cannot be proved obscene without proving the Bible and hundreds of other books in common use equally so.

The simple truth is, that neither the book, nor the mailing of the book, is criminal in the light of anything which deserves to be called law. The crime is all in the imprisonment of a man for the exercise of that mental liberty which is the very thing most sacredly guarded by the Constitution of the United States. He openly defied a law, which, as it is interpreted by his judges, is a most dangerous and criminal violation of the Constitution. All the more honor to him. Of course he did it at his peril. All the more shame to us if we allow an innocent man who defies a bad and infamous law to suffer harm in our behalf. I would not have dared to defy that law as he did, any more than I would seize a rattlesnake by the tail. That "Society for the Suppression of Vice" of which the vicious Comstock is the agent is itself the tool of a pauper priesthood in imminent peril of having to starve or earn its living by honest labor, on account of the spread of "modern infidelity." It would be glad to "stamp out" the Truth Seeker, THE INDEX, and all such organs of freethought, but has no law for it as yet. What it cannot do directly it is trying to do indirectly, by enticing into its venomous trap every freethinker whose pluck exceeds his discretion. In the name of Liberty, is pluck a crime?

I don't ask the President to pardon, but to liberate, Bennett. It is really impossible to pardon an innocent man. The President has some reason to ask pardon for allowing him to be prosecuted. His judges surely should ask pardon for their outrageous rulings. A republican congress should ask pardon for enacting a law, which, even if not unconstitutional itself, was sure to be used unconstitutionally. The leading politicians in Congress had better seize the earliest opportunity to secure the liberation of the innocent man, for that political party which sides with the remonstrants against it is destined to sink where no resurrection will ever greet it. Liberty of muscle has been achieved, and liberty of soul is the next thing in order.

E. W.

[It seems to us that Mr. Wright presents a distorted view of the subject of his communication. There are facts on both sides of the controversy that should qualify his judgment in respect to it, with which he has no acquaintance or fails to take into account. Of one thing we feel quite sure: while we do not approve all of Anthony Comstock's ways any more than we do of D. M. Bennett's, he is doing very largely a most desirable work, for which Mr. Wright and all of us owe him most hearty thanks. But, apart from this, it appears to us the subject has been amply discussed already. Mr. Bennett is not of the kind that suffer in silence.

Furthermore, unless our impressions greatly mislead us, the readers of THE INDEX long ago had heard all they care to upon the subject. It is one on which the radicals of the country are hopelessly divided. Had better counsels prevailed, it might have been otherwise. They would have been a unit in respect to it, and the evils of which Mr. Wright now complains, so far as they are real, would have been swept away before the resistless force of a common sentiment of justice swelled by thousands beyond the radical ranks.

But the opportunity was recklessly sacrificed. Incompetent and unworthy persons were suffered to push themselves to the front; among whom some had cherished a remorseless spite against Mr. Abbot for years, and saw in the occasion a chance to humiliate him, as they thought, and strike at what they knew to be dearer than his life. Vindictiveness, wrong-headedness, and selfishness prevailed; and behold the consequence! It is a deplorable spectacle. The injury which has thus been wrought to radicalism is immense. For Mr. Wright, personally, we have the highest esteem; but we think his fine sympathies and sense of equity have been imposed upon. His antecedents, years, and relation to THE INDEX as one of its stockholders, editorial contributors, firm and faithful friends in dark hours of its experience, entitle him to a consideration that does not belong to any ordinary writer for its columns. Still we think if he would let the subject which is so distasteful to many, and whose very discussion we believe to be vitiating in its influence, rest for the present, and give his bright and always interesting pen to other themes for the few weeks that remain of our editorial care of the paper, it would be better for the general cause, which we doubt not he has as much at heart as ourselves.—ED.]

MUCH DEPENDS upon the point of view we occupy in looking at things. Mr. Beecher, in commenting upon the address of Col. Ingersoll over the grave of his brother, pronounced the case exceptionally melancholy, because Mr. Ingersoll had no stronger faith in an hereafter. Death is always an event of great sadness, more especially when it tears two hearts apart that have tenderly loved each other. But we have yet to be convinced that those who make great profession of faith in immortality are any more reconcilable to such separations than those who are destitute of it. We have yet to be convinced that they are any more serene, heroic, or submissive under the ills of human existence. Here is an example that bears upon the point. It is taken from a biographical sketch of the late Prof. Clifford: "Far be it from me, as it was far from him, to grudge to any man or woman the hope or comfort that may be found in sincere expectation of a better life to come. But let this be set down and remembered, plainly and openly, for the instruction and rebuke of those who fancy that their dogmas have a monopoly of happiness, and will not face the fact that there are true men—ay, and women—to whom the dignity of manhood and the fellowship of this life, undazzled by the magic of any revelation, unhelped of any promises holding out aught as higher or more enduring than the fruition of human love and the fulfilment of human duties, are sufficient to bear the weight of both life and death: Here was a man who utterly dismissed from his thoughts, as being unprofitable or worse, all speculations on a future unseen world; a man to whom life was holy and precious, a thing not to be despised, but to be used with joyfulness; a soul full of life and light, ever longing for activity, ever counting what was achieved as not worthy to be reckoned in comparison of what was left to do. And this is the witness of his ending, that as never man loved life more, so never man feared death less. He fulfilled well and truly that great saying of Spinoza, often in his mind and on his lips: 'Homo liber de nulla re minus quam de morte cogitat.'"

FRED TO CHUM: "I dreamt about you last night, Bob." Bob: "I hope it was pleasant." Fred: "Oh, yes; very pleasant while it lasted. I dreamt that you paid the ten dollars you owe me."—Harvard Lampoon.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

MRS. LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON is receiving a great deal of attention in England.

MISS SARAH BRUNHARDT, the great actress, is expected in this country in November.

MR. E. P. WHIPPLE, the essayist, and wife, are summering at the Bass Rock House, Gloucester.

ERNEST LONGFELLOW, the artist, son of the poet, is expected home from Europe shortly, after a three years' absence.

SECRETARY SHERMAN paid a visit to the poet Longfellow last Tuesday. He also made a call at the residence of Dr. Holmes.

MR. GLADSTONE has been making a vigorous plea for greater attention to the study of natural history in the schools of England.

PROF. GEIKE, the eminent Scotch geologist, is to deliver a course of lectures next winter before the Lowell Institute of this city.

VICTOR HUGO thinks it is far better to be fifty years old than forty. "Fifty," he says, "is the youth of old age, while forty is the old age of youth."

MISS JULIET CORSON has opened a summer school for instruction in cooking, at Washington, Mrs. Hayes, Mrs. Evans, and other ladies of distinction are among her pupils.

PROF. LEWIS B. MUNROE, a distinguished teacher of elocution and Dean of the Boston University School of Oratory, who recently died at Dublin, N.H., is reported to have been a Spiritualist.

PROF. R. A. PROCTOR contemplates another lecturing tour in this country the coming season. Instead of confining his lectures, as when here before, to the Northern States, he will visit the South and Canada.

GILES B. STEBBINS, who spoke at Coe Hall, Florence, Sunday, July 20, was in the city last week, and spent a day at Mr. Alcott's School of Philosophy. Mr. Stebbins was on his way to the Spiritualist camp-meeting at Onset Bay, to fill an engagement to speak there.

MR. FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY, of the Free Religious Society of Providence, is prepared to accept invitations to speak for any Sunday in August, and for the first and second Sundays in September. He may be addressed at Midland Street, Dorchester Station, Boston, until the 15th of September, when he resumes his work at Providence.

MR. JOHN TREVOR, who has been pursuing a course of study in the Theological School of Meadville, Pa., chooses to work in behalf of Free Religion rather than Liberal Christianity. He has drawn up an excellent statement of "Principles" for the foundation of independent societies. At present, Mr. Trevor is initiating such an enterprise at West Chester, Pa.

PROBABLY the oldest teacher in the world, says Nature, is the venerable M. Chevreul. This eminent chemist, who is about ninety years of age, has been advertised as lecturer on chemistry in the Paris Museum. The first part of his lectures will be devoted to the subject of contrast of colors. M. Chevreul enjoys excellent health and exhibits admirable bodily as well as mental activity.

COL. HIGGINSON thinks that justice has not been done to Thorau. Too much emphasis has been placed on his eccentricities. He says that as a companion he was essentially sincere, wholesome, and enjoyable. Though more or less a humorist, nursing his own whims, and capable of being tiresome when they came uppermost, he was easily led away from them to the vast domain of literature and Nature, and then poured forth endless streams of the most interesting talk. His home life was thoroughly affectionate and faithful; he never made his whims an excuse for mere selfishness. His life-long celibacy, the Colonel says, was due to the noblest unselfishness, an early and lofty self-abnegation towards his own brother, whose love had taken the same direction with his own.

TENEMENT HOUSES WITHOUT WINDOWS.—Oh, I know just how it feels. Haven't I been through it all? No air. The sun never gets in. Why, in that very house there are thirty-two dark rooms that never get a breath except from the ones they open into. You sleep in one once, even when you're used to it, and there's a band round your head when you wake up as if you had an iron cap screwed on, and a sinking and craving at your stomach. You don't want to eat. There's nothing answers it but whiskey; and with the smell of that you forget the other smells. You do with less food after a glass of that. Darkness means the devil's own deeds. Ah, I couldn't tell you what sights I've seen. I think sometimes how it is that God himself does not turn sick and sweep it all away. Men, women, and children, and less sense than beasts. You see, packed in that way it's easy enough to get in a hundred and eighty or even two hundred. They do not need to be so packed, but they get not to care. There are empty rooms now up these side streets, but they want the excitement of hearing what all have to tell, and most of them drink too hard to have money left for anything but their own plank or two on a floor. When it comes to such a pass, I say the only way left is clean destruction.—Sunday Afternoon for May.

THE OTHER DAY some Congregational ministers in New Haven discussed the question; "How to secure a higher tone of morality and business integrity in the churches." In the course of the discussion, Dr. Bacon spoke of a deacon of whom one remarked, "Godward he is well enough, but manward he is a little risky."

PASSING THOUGHTS.

The implanted social instinct does not always wisely choose. Every individual must have recourse to an inner power, a firm-supporting life within, to modulate outward attractions. Neither love, nor fear, nor pity, must override the mentions of the sustaining selfhood. To serve, one needs first to be. But the recognition of this fact must not lead to its mechanical observance. Too much method is vicious and ends in disaster. Like Ward's soldiers who stood so straight they fell backwards, we may miss our aim by overdoing. Yet it remains true that to give we must have. There can be no society without individuals; and if truly social, we first are religious. Home-life is sanctification and preparation, a consecration of the individual gift, to be strongly grasped and serenely held, nor parted with in conceding demands to enlist in benevolent or propagandist raids on the world's ignorance or wickedness; for every such surrender is suicidal,—a narrowing of vision and spoiling of temper, until people get so in rage for the glory of the god or truth they worship, they hesitate at no persecution or sacrifice of any foe that stands in their way. 'Tis the language of all the sects or organized bodies for the spread of special doctrines: "Take the dose, or be"—in some way more or less damaging—"damned." It is not that the people of a particular order are peculiar and different from mankind generally. We are all alike. In proportion to the power over others we wield we become bigoted propagators of the "views" of our order and blind to all else. We think when we begin that it is easy enough to keep "broad and liberal." But the hell of persecution has always been paved with these good intentions. Either by our "revelation" or our "logic" we establish the truth and the right, and then, holding the power to coerce, how easy it is to believe that society is not safe unless we, in some fashion or other, exact conformity! There is an illusion about it. We all share it; the old experience never convincing the younger generation, which is always sure it can perform the impossible if only its heart is right. There is protest, a shout for liberty, and then, an "urgent demand for organization." So runs history from the beginning. People reason thus: "We have protested, we have left the old organization where liberty was slain. But our attitude is negative; we exert no influence in public affairs. The great world is lying all about us and waiting for precisely the very idea we have got. If we could only put it forth with power! But as individuals we amount to little. 'Tis the show of numbers and the sinews of war we need. Yet here we stand and don't even know one another. Surely in union there is strength. All the rest of the world combines: why shouldn't we? Drops of water make the ocean, and what a power is it! Grains of sand cohering fashion the globe itself: now if we can only come together and act as one force, we can remake the world! Have we no mission? Shall we stand idle, apart, and powerless, glaring impotently at each other? No! a thousand times no! Let us be up and doing."

"With a heart for any fate."

The flint strike fire, the conflagration spreads, and lo! a new "association," "sect," or what not, is competing for the dominance of its "truth and righteousness" on the same old, old field of battle. Then people begin to feel that they are "doing something," and are somebody. As individuals they were without force; but, attached to "constitution and by-laws," facing the world in rows, they begin to put on their might, and to look, it must be confessed, quite formidable. To the outer man they may in truth prove a terror; and undoubtedly they serve to hold things up and together that would else tumble off the earth's edge.

But all this does not count as spiritual power, as religious vitality. No amount of coming together, no massing of numbers or imposing display of creed, however rational, ever quickened a latent soul. That is not awakened or taught by the overpowering or the enchantment of the senses. You will see the persons converted thus from one sect to another remain quite the same. They are followers after and believers in something that is not in themselves. They swap one god for another, but you would not know it if they did not make the proclamation. Who are you? they ask. Well, it matters not; but say you are Baptist, Unitarian, or Free Religionist. Ah, that is clear; they know now where to place you. They have got you labelled, photographed, and can hang you away and give themselves no further concern; but whether in rogue or saint gallery depends. Unless you belong to some religious body (other than your own), you are supposed to be "nothing," religiously speaking. How often one hears the remark after all the sects have been remembered, and the individual interrogated is not of the persuasion of any of them, "Then you don't believe in anything. I should think you would want to believe in something." This is the talk of ignorance, and there is a great deal of it. The only way is to wink at it and go quietly along. One thing, as I said: you will not mend matters by joining church or sect, by subscribing to a few "points," like the Calvinistic "five" or more, as the wit of your leaders may spin them. The vicious will may strengthen, the dogged, stolid understanding increase; but from your soul the bloom will depart, and the freshness and inspiration of your presence, the invigoration of personal encounter, will be known no more. Procy and jaded with your commonplace doctrines, you and your fellow "members" will turn the life out of everything. Instead of society, you will get a horde of people whose pride and justification it is that they all believe alike: that, not absolutely by the necessities of their being,—for then the idea of formal written ligatures and endless doctrinal affirmations would not arise. They would flow together in the true life; flow indeed, as water, though they never met. And if they met, as we say when outwardly we approach one another, it would need no label of sect or fraternity to serve for introduction. We know our own the world over, and are known by them. Nature attends to that: why need we be so anxious, and waste our hours trying to agree, or seeking a unity of spirit? Agreement already exists, or for your pressing need there is none. And if the spirit is not manifest, you cannot by organized pumping manufacture it. The realities will assert themselves if we do not come strutting in with our solemn-visaged penny wisdom. They will not grind at our machine. They resent the insult and scout our lack of faith.

The realities, however, never fall in some sort doing their work. We may fall to see their achievements, to explore and map and describe their kingdom that is ever coming "without observation." That is the only failure worth speaking of,—a failure not pleasant for our own reflection, nor profitable to our neighbors. The remedy is, not a new organization, but the opening of new eyes to our faith in ideas about which we prate, yet believe in so little. To my mind, this faith is not shown by zealous interference. Ideas are winged and have a life of their own. Leave them to their own course and flight. Natural carrier doves, they know their trip and they will not return to you void. The best service they can demand is your homage and your trust. Harness them with bit and rein to your new sect, and compel them to cart you or it whithersoever they go, and you and all concerned must come to grief.

The best institution is the individual. All else is make-believe, temporary habitation, sham institution, which winds and rain destroy.

I hear 'tis said individualism has failed. I don't care about the ism, but rest assured that when it becomes true that the individual can no more be a success, society will end ingloriously then and there. Without the individual, society is a mush or a war. Instead of being passed, the day of the individual has but just begun. It is where the individual is most respected that the social welfare most abounds. Individual means each and all. Some assume to think that it means each for himself and against all. That might be called a self-ism, and be so in a vulgar and very idiotic way; but the individualist proper, and the only individualistic philosophy I know anything about, declares one's neighbor an individual to be respected as himself.

The other and opposite philosophy deliberately professes the right to sacrifice one individual or more for the good of the rest. It does whatever it thinks best for the welfare of the greatest number. It is utilitarian and I should say godless and immoral, too, save as it may shape what it calls a moral code out of its limited experience. This is the old fault,—in the name of the universal, sacrificing the individual. Numbers and might make the right.

Against this, individualism protests. It asserts that wherever the individual is represented the race is represented, because all are seen there in the one type; not the greater number, not white or black, not male or female, Jew or Greek, Saxon or Chinese, but the whole. For these many millions are so many individuals. And when they as individuals, associate or singly, respect individuals, civilization and the social well-being are accomplished.

Let it be understood that those who do not respect the rights and the prosperity of their fellows are not individualists, but selfists.

The morale of society is not made outright by those who deem themselves wisest. It is not a matter of opinion, nor the result of certain able men's logic. All are bound to be able men in a matter they are by necessity compelled to decide. If they take the advice of others, they must be able to say who those wisest others are. Where the individual can form no conviction, he must manage as he can,—drift and take "pot luck," as the saying is. But, if he reach a conviction, he must abide by it, let all other individuals take other paths. He need not be wilful and rash; he can rest on his judgments till he finds that they abide. He may or may not "vote urgency" for his action; but in the end he cannot be false to his own judgments and remain a man, let the world laugh, weep, or damn.

As a practical matter, it is the lack of this individual reasoning, judging, that keeps people apart and in disagreement on those things where agreement is important. To develop mutual understanding and harmonious action, we must encourage the private judgment. That is the world's education. All people thinking tends to practical unities. It is so because the god within us, and in whom we all—good, bad, and indifferent—dwell, is One.

Private judgment is nothing more nor less than each one judging what this god means, what Nature means, what life means. To assert that it is a divorce from the law of life written in human nature is absurd. There is no divorce, but, on the contrary, a solemn duty. 'Tis for each to discover what the law is, in order intelligently to give it heed.

THE GENESIS OF ETHICS—COLLOQUIALLY CANVASSED.

Old School Philosopher.—Tut! tut! man, don't tell me there's no such thing as universal, absolute morality; that morality is nothing but what each community, for itself, makes it. The idea's preposterous. Two communities may differ never so far from each other as to what is right in a given case. But to say they can so differ and yet one of them not be wrong, is as absurd as it would be to say that two substances may differ entirely from each other and yet both be identical with a third substance.

Rationalist.—Is your observation intended as an argument?

O. S. Phil.—Yes, sir; and I apprehend you'll find it a very sound argument, too. Pray, what exceptions can you take to it as an argument?

Rationalist.—It begs the question. I admit, of course, that if two communities differ from each other as to what is absolutely right, one of them must be wrong. Indeed, I think they will both be wrong in the matter of assuming that there is any absolute right. And I admit, of course, too, that if they were to differ in regard to what was right in the same community, one or the other would necessarily be wrong. But that has nothing to do with an action's being perfectly right in one community that would be altogether wrong in another, if each community can, as I maintain, have a different standard of right and wrong; that is to say, a different morality. Your argument, however, coolly takes for granted that they cannot. From the very start, you assume that there is an absolute, fixed, and immutable standard and code for all communities; which, of course, is a begging of the very question at issue. Do you not see that it is?

O. S. Phil.—Not very clearly.

Rationalist.—I think I can make it perfectly clear. Suppose we substitute the word "legality" for "morality" and the word "lawful" for the word "right" in the argument you have advanced, and see if it will not then establish that what is "legal" in one community is legal everywhere quite as conclusively as it now does that what is right in one is right everywhere. Or, in other words, whether such argument will not answer quite as well for proving the existence of an universal absolute legality as it does now in proving the existence of that sort of a morality.

O. S. Phil.—Oh, we all know each State makes its own laws, without necessary regard to the laws of any other State; and therefore, of course, that what is altogether unlawful in one may be perfectly lawful in the other, and vice versa.

Rationalist.—Just so. And what I claim is that each community makes its own morals, and therefore that what is altogether immoral in one may be perfectly moral in another, and vice versa. You deny this and affirm that there is one universal, absolute morality, so that what is immoral here and now is, always has been, and will forever be immoral everywhere. Now in attempting to prove your position, if you lay it down as a premise that if two communities differ from each other as to what is right one of them must be wrong, you simply beg the question; precisely as I should do, were I—in trying to prove that there is an absolute universal legality, and that State legislatures do not make laws but only declare more or less correctly what the laws already are—were to say or to lay it down as a premise that if two States differ from each other in such an instance one of them must be wrong.

O. S. Phil.—Well, well, but facts are facts; and they are none the less so, no matter who discredits or ignores them. The earth revolved on its axis when nobody believed that it did, just the same as it does now, when all intelligent people know that it does. And parricide and cannibalism are just as essentially and absolutely immoral in the Feejee Islands, where everybody believes that the proper thing to do is to kill and eat one's parents when they get too old to be useful, as such a practice would be here, where people even of the least intelligence and virtue perceive its ghastly atrociousness.

Rationalist.—It is useless, I suppose, to remind you that you are still begging the question when you assume that parricide, cannibalism, or that anything, is essentially and absolutely immoral. I will, therefore, answer that the earth did not revolve on its axis till after the planetary system of which it is a part came into existence, nor were parricide and cannibalism immoral till the social system that made them so began to exist. And although by our social system it would be heinous and in the last degree wrong for a man to slay and eat his father, it might be perfectly right for him to do so if only our social system were very different from what it is; just as the earth might turn on its axis once an hour, or only once a week, or not turn at all, if our planetary system were altogether different from what it is.

O. S. Phil.—Then you contend that in the Feejee Islands it is actually right for a man to kill and eat his superannuated father?

Rationalist.—If such is the universal or very general practice there, I contend that it is actually right there.

O. S. Phil.—How right?

Rationalist.—Right, in line with the social system and moral standard of the Feejeans.

O. S. Phil.—Ay; but is such social system or moral standard itself right?

Rationalist.—Right for what?

O. S. Phil.—Why, right for—right for—well, right for an approving conscience in one conforming to it.

Rationalist.—Yes, sir, if it is a Feejean conscience.

O. S. Phil.—But a normal conscience?

Rationalist.—I never before heard of a normal conscience, and can't conceive of one.

O. S. Phil.—Well, then, any enlightened—a duly and properly enlightened conscience?

Rationalist.—That depends upon whether it was duly and properly enlightened as to the Feejean or some other standard of morality, and by a Feejee or some other training and environment.

O. S. Phil.—But do you yourself say that the Feejee morality is as good as our morality?

Rationalist.—As good for what?

O. S. Phil.—Why as good—as good for—for anybody, for anything?

Rationalist.—Immensely better for the Feejeans, regard being had to their happiness.

O. S. Phil.—But is it as good for you? Had you just as soon Feejean morality should prevail here as ours?

Rationalist.—By no manner of means. Feejean morality is not as good for me as ours. In fact, it would be intolerable for me. But what's the admission worth for the purposes of this discussion? Our language, our music, and our laws also suit me much better, respectively, than do the Feejee language, music, and laws. But that doesn't prove, nor tend in the slightest to prove, that our language, music, and laws are other than purely human institutions; that they have not been created, and are not being every day modified by society. And as it wouldn't prove, nor tend to prove, that there is any universal, absolute, or God-given language, system of music, or code of laws, neither does my preferring our morality or any particular morality tend to prove that that or any other morality is the universal absolute per se or God-given morality. By the way, I am happy to have the admission from you at last, that there are other moralities than our own, which you make when you ask if I consider the Feejee morality as good as ours.

O. S. Phil.—And I, sir, am immensely relieved to learn that you really consider our morality as at least preferable to that of the Feejee Islanders.

IS THE TRAMP A NECESSITY?

MR. EDITOR:—

There is in THE INDEX of May 15 a communication signed "A Subscriber," in which occurs the following statement: "An industrial system which allows the growth of our Stewarts and Vanderbilts necessitates the opposite growth of the tramp." To my mind, this statement should be read conversely thus: An industrial system which allows the growth of the tramp necessitates the opposite growth of the Stewarts and Vanderbilts.

The tramp, in at least nine cases out of ten, is made by idleness and vicious habits of some kind. The Stewarts and Vanderbilts are made by industry and economical habits. Now where should we begin to abate the evils complained of? By encouraging what makes the tramp, or what makes the Stewarts and Vanderbilts? Is not this true: if you would get out of the world what makes the tramp, you must banish from the world the Stewarts and Vanderbilts, and also the tramps?

There is in the world only about four hundred dollars each, for man, woman, and child. Now where is the man or woman of thirty who cannot by using industry and economy (the very things tramps throw away) have his or her share of the world's property for themselves and their families, if they have such? This done, then the Stewarts and Vanderbilts would be an impossibility, for then they could have no more than their share, plus what they added to the wealth of the world. I have said, in nine cases out of ten tramps are made by idleness and vicious habits of some kind. In proof of this, I appeal to the experience of all. We all know hundreds who have never received a penny, only of their own earnings, who have their share of the world's property; and the industry and economy which secured it to them will secure it to others. Disease and imbecility, I know, may form exceptions; but for such, humanity will provide.

CONFOUNDING NAMES.

Confounding names may not be a crime, but it certainly is an error, the effects of which in some instances are most dire. The chief corner stone upon which is builded the priestly "Tower of Babel" is made by uniting the words Jesus and Christ, thereby making a compound proper name.

Should reference be made to Humboldt Astronomer, one would naturally reason that the person mentioned was Humboldt the Astronomer; otherwise, Humboldt a discoverer, teacher, and demonstrator of the science governing heavenly bodies; and in like manner Jesus the Christ, or Jesus a discoverer, teacher, and demonstrator of the science governing human beings.—Jesus being the man, Christ the science, and God its principle, as is Humboldt the man, astronomy the science, and God the principle.

Although additional light was received by the advent of these teachers, nevertheless, being exponents of a principle, they came not through any dispensation therefrom; and praying to Jesus to make one a saint is no more efficacious than praying to Humboldt to make one an astronomer.

The interminable muddle, by means of which priestcraft has been enabled for centuries to keep the masses in both mental and physical bondage, will speedily disappear when the talent reason is dug up and those who through fear have hidden it realize that it is as a gift of God designed for use. Concerning temporal affairs, reason is considered most essential, but when our eternal welfare is at stake we silence its voice in the interest of religious fraud.

B. F. FULLER.

AN ENGLISH CLERGYMAN was "turned down" at a fashionable spelling-bee for spelling drunkenness with one "n." Shortly afterward he returned to his parish, and found himself very coldly received by his parishioners. He sent for the parish clerk and asked him what was the cause. "Well, sir," replied the man, "a report has come down here that you was turned out of a great lady's house in London for drunkenness."

FOREIGN.

BONA MORS.—Under this title the church of which the Prince Imperial was a devout adherent, at Chislehurst, has prescribed a series of pathetic orisons.

OWING TO THE dulness of trade and the general feeling of social and political insecurity pervading all Russian society, the Industrial Exhibition contemplated for next year at Moscow has been postponed till 1881.

GENERAL MYER, of the United States Signal Corps, has arrived in Paris from Rome, on his way to London, where he will have an interview with the Meteorological Board for the purpose of establishing an understanding in matters of common interest, especially on the subject of exchanging telegrams with America, so that both nations may enjoy a daily summary of the weather on each continent.

AMONG THE LADIES who came over from France to attend the funeral of the Prince Imperial was Madame Thayer, the widow of one of the ministers of Napoleon III. She is the daughter of General Bertrand, who accompanied Napoleon I. to St. Helena, and remained by him to the last. When a girl she stood by the bedside of the dying Emperor, and heard his last utterance: Mon fils... tête de Ferme. This lady has now in her possession the original pencil-sketch of the mortal remains of the "sublime infortuné de Sainte Helene," as Thiers styled him, made a few hours after his death, by Captain (then midshipman) J. Marryat of the Royal Navy. From her birth she has shared the chequered fortunes of the imperial family of France.

"THE MINISTERS," says the National Reformer, "have figured very badly in the debate on the question of flogging in the army. Mr. W. H. Smith, after positively stating that no marine cat-o'-nine-tails existed, has been compelled to withdraw his inaccurate statement and to apologize for his unfounded reply to Mr. Callan. The House of Commons carried its Saturday sitting into Sunday morning, and as the members were noisy and turbulent, the Lord's Day Observance Society ought to prosecute those present for following their ordinary avocations on the Sabbath day. The marine cat, the existence of which was denied, seems especially capable of an enormous power of inflicting pain. At each full stroke it is said to be able to inflict eighty-one lacerations."

THE BRITISH SECULAR UNION, which has for its principal objects to promote "political, social, or religious reform in any wise tending to increase the secular happiness of the people," publishes the following statement of its principles: "1. That the present life being the only one of which we have any certain knowledge, its concerns claim our primary attention. 2. That the promotion of our individual and of the general well-being in this world is at once our highest wisdom and duty. 3. That the only means upon which we can rely for the accomplishment of this object is human effort, based upon knowledge and experience. 4. We judge conduct by its issues in this world only: what conduces to the general well-being is right; what has the opposite tendency is wrong. 5. On all questions outside these positive principles of secularism, members are free to hold any opinions, and to promulgate such on their own authority."

SETTINGS.

A COLORED brother in a Virginia church prayed at the close of a white brother's sermon: "Lord, brass de brudder to whom we has listened to so patiently."

"OK, DOCTOR, how I suffer!" "Come, come, madame! I don't believe there's anything serious the matter with you." "Oh, how you torment me! It would serve you right if I were to die right under your nose!"—Ottawa Herald.

HALF-WAY UP THE HILL.—Grandpa: "By George, I must stop and blow a bit, Tommy." Tommy: "All right, grandpa; I've got a stone to put under your heel."—Punch.

A LIMBURGER cheese factory at Great Bend, Penn., was struck by lightning the other night and entirely destroyed. Another proof that victory is not always with the strong.—Hartford Post.

DEACON JONES, just deceased, had a very red nose. His widow thought it rather personal in the minister to begin his funeral discourse: "Another shining light has been taken from our congregation."

WOULD PREFER A WHITE ONE.—"What," says an inquisitive young lady, "is the most popular color for a bride?" and the Elmira Gazette answers: "We may be a little particular in such matters, but we should prefer a white one."

THERE WAS MUCH sound, palpable argument in the speech of a country lad to an idler who boasted his ancient family. "So much the worse for you," said the peasant; "as we ploughmen say, 'the older the seed, the worse the crop.'"—N. Y. Tribune.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN once listened patiently while a friend read a long manuscript to him, and then asked, "What do you think of it?" The President reflected a little while, and then answered: "Well, for people who like that kind of thing, I think that's just about the kind of thing they'd like."—N. Y. Tribune.

HE WAS A CHRISTIAN.—The late Baron James Rothschild used to tell with great delight about an old clerk who called upon him one day to get a leave of absence for a few days and a month's pay in advance. "It will be a great accommodation to me," he said, "and I won't forget it." The Baron granted his request unhesitatingly, whereupon the clerk squeezed his hand warmly, crying: "You're a Christian, you are. I'll do as much for you next time."

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,
HENRY S. SYMINGTON.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.Y.
J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.
ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.
JAMES E. OLIVER, Ithaca, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.25 for one year, including postage, or 25 cents for three months on trial.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

SIFTINGS.

THERE IS A SINGLE farm in Kansas which is reported to have a river frontage of over thirty miles.

NOT OUT OF THE mouth of two or three witnesses nor of two or three millions, unless they be experts, can any great fact be established.—George M. Beard, M.D.

IT IS SAID that about one-half of the banished Nihilists die before reaching their place of banishment, and the manner in which the government treats them indicates a desire to kill them off.

ISMAIL PASHA has shaken off the dust from his sandals and gone to Vienna, where he and his two sons and four wives and small army of appendages to his state and person will meditate upon the sad mutations of fortune.

ONE OF THE latest in the way of religious sects is located at what is designated Land of Life, a settlement of Adventists at Germania, Wis. Benjamin Hall, formerly a Boston dry-goods merchant, is said to be at the head of the community, which has some wealth. The members keep no Sabbath and believe that Christ's second coming will be in their community.

ONE OF THE BOSTON papers announced in its recent Monday issue, "The Rev. Dr. H. W. Bellows, of New York, preached yesterday before the Free Religious Society, Roxbury." As we have never heard before of a Free Religious Society in Roxbury, will some one be so kind as to give us some information in regard to it. Where is it situated? When was it founded?

M. DE LESSEP is one of those who don't believe in letting their abilities rust out from inaction. In addition to the trifling little matter which he has already on hand of cutting a tunnel through the solid mountain to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, he now proposes a railroad of sixteen thousand miles across the Desert of Sahara. It will only cost, he thinks, $80,000,000.

TO HAVE THE FEELINGS of gentility, it is not necessary to have been born gentle. The pride of ancestry may be had on cheaper terms than to be obliged to an importunate race of ancestors. The claims of birth are ideal merely. What herald shall go about to strip me of an idea? Is it trenchant to their swords? Can it be hacked off as a spur can? or torn away like a tarnished garter?—Charles Lamb.

A BILL HAS BEEN introduced in the Illinois Legislature for the taxation of church property. The Chicago Times sensibly comments upon it as follows: "Only from five to ten per cent. of the people of Illinois use the churches or have any interest in them; and hence it is manifest injustice to the remaining ninety or ninety-five per cent. that they should be compelled to pay for that portion of the benefits of government which church property enjoys."

THERE IS A prospect of another telephone hero. F. A. Gower, of Sedgwick, Ma., but more recently associated with the press of Providence, R.I., is the coming man this time. He is represented to be not quite thirty years of age, and his invention promises to surpass all the telephones now in use. At present he is in Paris, where influential persons are interested in getting it into notice, with the hope of obtaining from the government also a recognition of its merits.

A WRITER in the London Times says: "It would be altogether a mistake to suppose that Leo XIII. has the slightest intention of abdicating one jot or tittle of what he considers to be the inalienable rights of the Pontificate. He is not calling the best talents of the Church around him to help him to yield or find some means of conciliation, but to strengthen himself in maintaining what he holds to be his rights in such a way as may be best calculated to insure his regaining them."

ONE OF THE blessed charities of which all humane persons will be gratified to learn, is the Floating Baby Hospital of Chicago. It is reported to be doing an immense amount of good. "Weak, puny, sickly little children who were taken out to the pier when the hot weather opened, have become transformed into bright, active, hardy little creatures with most prodigious appetites; and the effect upon the poor, hard-worked, and tired mothers is similarly gratifying. When the little visitors from the hot, close by-streets and the hotter and dirtier alleys tire of the pier and long for a change and a roll in the grass, they are carried or trundled along in baby-carriages to Lincoln Park, near by, where they find all they want in that respect, and testify their delight by shouts of joy and any amount of infantile hilarity."

WE PRINT, in the place of the usual essay, in this number of THE INDEX, an extended and comprehensive statement of the Coöperative Colonization Society lately established in New York City. It cannot fail to be of interest, we think, as the presentation of an effort to solve one of the most serious and difficult problems of the life of our great cities. The movement is one which has earnestly engaged the energies of Prof. Felix Adler, the President of the Free Religious Association, if he is not indeed entitled to be considered its protector. It illustrates in this respect the capacity of Free Religion for something more than mere iconoclasm. It shows its adaptability to philanthropy as well as philosophy and criticism. It is certainly a very notable sign of the times, of the dissolution of old prejudices and antagonisms in a freer and more fraternal fellowship, when persons as opposite in their ways of thinking and connections as the Rev. Dr. Potter of Trinity Church, New York, and Mr. Frothingham, the Rev. R. Heber Newton and Felix Adler, can come together for mutual counsel and coöperation in great works of charity and human service. Surely the morning light of a better day for humanity is breaking.

THE PRESBYTERY of Wooster, O., prefer genuine, first-quality Orthodoxy rather than a diluted article. The Rev. A. N. Alcott was ordained by it some nine years ago. At the time, Mr. Alcott came considerably short of its strict standard of doctrine. In other words, he was disposed to the view of what is termed unlimited atonement, instead of the more Calvinistic one of election, in respect to salvation. But somehow he was permitted to pass and enter upon the regular work of his profession. Since then he has built up at Fredericksburgh, where he has been settled, the largest and most flourishing church within the bounds of its presbytery. But all this time he has been subjected to a good deal of discomfiture on account of the milder form of his Orthodoxy than that of some of the brethren of the neighborhood. This at last forced him to put this question to the Presbytery at its meeting, June 25th: "May a Presbyterian minister preach the doctrine of an unlimited atonement?" This he explained, in an accompanying speech before the Presbytery, to be in the sense in which the atonement had been held by Albert Barnes and other distinguished representatives of his denomination. After the usual amount of ceremony and circumlocution peculiar to such cases, the committee to whom the matter was referred reported that the doctrine of an unlimited atonement cannot be preached in the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Alcott has accordingly asked at once for his name to be stricken from the roll of the ministers of the Presbytery, and has also withdrawn from the pastorate of the church at Fredericksburgh. He is represented to be a person of exceptional ability, scholarship, and character. His action is certainly very commendable, and evinces quite unmistakably his conscientiousness and honesty. It is an example to ministers in the churches of all denominations.

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse,
N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature: and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress: and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard the action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The Co-operative Colony Aid Association of New York.

Its History.

The Coöperative Colony Aid Association came into being in this wise: Some of those now members of it had been thinking much and feeling strongly over the philanthropic aspects of colonization as the real relief for our over-crowded labor centres, and the cure of the evils growing out of this congestion in the great cities. Some informal conversation was exchanged upon the subject. A scheme for coöperative colonization submitted by Mr. H. B. Sharpe, of Houston, Texas, sufficed as a point of crystallization.

A small meeting was held in the rooms of the State Charities Aid Association, to discuss the scheme submitted by Mr. Sharpe; Mr. Joseph Seligman in the chair and Mr. Courtlandt Palmer acting as secretary.

There were present at this meeting, Dr. Stephen Smith, E. E. Barnum, Hon. John Wheeler, Prof. Felix Adler, Mr. H. E. Sharpe, Rev. R. Heber Newton, and others.

This meeting appointed a committee of five, consisting of Prof. Felix Adler, Hon. John Wheeler, Dr. Stephen Smith, Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, and Rev. R. Heber Newton, to consider the whole subject. This committee held several sessions in the study of the problem presented to it, coming to a unanimous agreement upon the necessity for some organized movement to further the colonization of our unemployed workers, and upon the general principles of such colonization enterprise. The committee then called at short intervals several private conferences, inviting by letter prominent citizens deemed likely to feel an interest in the subject. These conferences were attended by leading citizens interested in philanthropic work, such as Hon. John Jay, F. B. Thurber, Dorman B. Eaton, Rev. Henry C. Potter, D.D., Mr. E. E. Barnum, Rev. O. B. Frothingham, Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, and many others; and letters were received expressive of deep interest in the object of the movement from Chancellor Crosby, Gen. Le Duc, United States Commissioner of Agriculture, and others.

At one of these conferences Mr. Franklin W. Smith, of Boston, was present by special invitation, to present the plans and purposes of the "Boston Board of Aid to Land Ownership."

As a result of these conferences, at a meeting held in Mr. Palmer's house, Gramercy Park, it was resolved to proceed to the organization of a society in the interest of colonization, and a committee was appointed to draft articles of association, consisting of Prof. Felix Adler, Mr. E. V. Smalley, and Rev. R. Heber Newton. This committee reported to a subsequent meeting the constitution under which the society was formally organized.

To carry on the work of the Association, an executive committee was appointed, consisting of the following gentlemen:—

Following gentlemen:—
J. H. Rylance, D.D., Joseph Seligman, Hon. John Wheeler, Charles F. Deems, D.D., George B. Satterlee, F. B. Thurber, Courtlandt Palmer, D.D., Williamson, Rev. R. Heber Newton, Felix Adler, Ph.D., E. V. Smalley.

The Executive Committee met weekly during May, planning out the preliminary stages of the work contemplated. In the absence in Europe of Mr. Palmer, Mr. C. F. Wingate was appointed Provisional Secretary of the Board of Directors. The full officering of the Association was deferred until the fall. The Committee saw the need of obtaining the services of an efficient agent to carry on the extensive correspondence laid out, and to meet workmen and others desirous of becoming acquainted with our aims; and also of an office for both of these purposes.

At this juncture a lady whose noble deeds are well known stepped forward with a characteristic offer, through Mr. E. E. Barnum. In the name of Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, the Executive Committee were empowered to open an office and engage a secretary for six months.

At her suggestion an office committee, consisting of Rev. R. Heber Newton, Prof. Felix Adler, Mr. E. V. Smalley, with Mr. J. K. Ingalls as Secretary, was appointed to supervise the office work. That office, No. 25 Cooper Union, is now open daily, and the work, as outlined in the article following, duly begun.

Its Aim.

Why is this new society formed? We propose now to state as definitely as possible what it aims to do. That aim is in general to further in every practical way emigration of the unemployed in our cities to the country, transfer of labor from the overcrowded industrial and trading classes to agriculture; and to do this systematically and continuously. To this end a society has been formed whose work will be to study the difficulties in the way of such a distribution of labor, and to overcome those obstacles as far as possible.

Emigration Education.

The first obstacle in the way of such migration as we advocate is the apathy or positive disinclination of those most needing this change. It might be assumed that the half-starved "wage-slave" of the city would be only too glad to become a free man on the soil, where, however hard-worked, he would at least be secure of shelter and food, and pure air for his little ones. But experience shows that there exists among those most needing this change a strong vis inertiae needing to be overcome by external pressure. They have few pleasurable associations with the country. They have no experience in its particular tasks. They are gregarious in proportion to their lack of education. The less there is in a man, the more he depends on his fellows. There seems to be always a chance for something to turn up in the city. Irregular work breaks down the habits of steady, hard labor, indispensable to success on the farm. The badly-fed, discouraged worker grows despondent. He loses power of initiative. Such a change looks too vague and risky. Instead of jumping at the chance to go, he who most needs to go has often to be pushed out. We propose to supply that pushing.—or perhaps we should say drawing.

We design to educate a sentiment in favor of this movement, through this paper, by meetings and lectures, hand-bills and personal intercourse. Thus we hope to start our workers thinking about this matter, satisfied that where there's a will there's a way, and that action will follow where desire becomes determination. We shall seek to foster colonization societies among workmen to study the subject and form thus the nuclei for future movements.

More Need of Guiding a Migratory Movement than of Manufacturing it.

There is less need of manufacturing a migratory movement than of guiding it. It already exists in our midst. The more enterprising of those who feel the pressure of the times are keenly alive to the advantage of getting on to the soil. They are not only thinking and talking, but acting. A steady stream is setting out from the East, South, and West. The papers give glimpses of this swelling stream. Individuals and groups are forsaking the crowded cities and settling in Georgia, Tennessee, Texas, Kansas, Minnesota. Some of these ventures turn out well. Some fail wholly. More succeed at last only after great loss of time and money and strength that might have been saved. If to-day a man in our Eastern cities determines to migrate, where is he to turn for information to guide his steps? Perhaps he has friends West or South. If so, he is apt to go to them. Otherwise, how is he to receive an answer to that question dinning in his ears, Where shall I go?

The pamphlets of land agents and railroad companies he does not trust. The reports of State agricultural commissioners are not easily accessible, and he suspects them of being colored by local enthusiasm. To migrate wisely, he needs to determine before he leaves the city what sort of a farm he wants, and to select his land with reference to the proper conditions for this specialty, inquiring into all the matters which touch his work, distance from towns, prices, wages, etc. To move safely and successfully, he needs to know every essential factor in his problem before he moves. He must do as the victorious general does,—master the situation before he acts. Where can he find the data for such knowledge? There is to-day in New York—we think we can add, in our Eastern cities—no office to which he can turn, confident that he will find there all available information for examination, and sure that he can trust its absolute disinterestedness. He must therefore make his choice on imperfect data, and, as so constantly turns out, finds out his mistake on the spot; laboring on against hope, or selling out at a sacrifice, to drift somewhere else and try again. Hundreds go through this ruinous experience every year. That which the Bureau of Migration which received Horace Greeley's latest care set out to provide, we aim to furnish,—a central office of reliable information for the gratuitous use of the people. We are in communication with the Land Commissioners of the Western and Southern States, and shall obtain their several reports, which will be placed on file in our office. Other documents which are at all trustworthy, bearing upon special localities, will be collected and filed. These will be verified so far as possible by the private judgments of leading men in these sections. Letters of inquiry covering the points on which knowledge is desired will be addressed to such parties. Reports of the national government bearing upon the subject will be accessible in our office. Thus the most reliable data obtainable will be always open to those interested in the subject, and any one can form an intelligent judgment and take advised action. Offers of land to work on shares, and other special propositions, will come in to us, as is already the case, and, if the parties are rightly endorsed, can be examined in our office, and particular needs thus be met. Our office, No. 25 Cooper Union, is now open each afternoon and evening, where the Office Secretary can be consulted, and where documents are being accumulated.

Association in Agriculture.

The work already shadowed is incidental to our ultimate aim. The chief obstacles to any such movements toward agriculture as the nation's condition demands are inherent in the individualistic action prevalent among our people. Their removal can be effected by ASSOCIATION. For one hundred families to migrate each by itself, is to throw away the immense economic and social advantages that would ensue from a combination on their part. That lack of combination in making such a change, and in the life on the soil, has been the great defect of our action hitherto.

Economic Advantages of Associated Agriculture.

The economic advantages of associated farming need only be considered to be perceived. To go forth alone to an isolated, unopened region, with no preparation on the spot in advance of the exodus, is a formidable undertaking. To go out to a spot where the agents of a company have made all necessary preliminary provisions, is a vastly easier experiment. One hundred families can make better common terms than any one single family can do; can hold and use the necessary expensive agricultural machines in common; can enact road laws which will prevent the waste of fencing; can lay out their farms so as to have some general system of farming to mutual advantage; can purchase seeds, tools, supplies of all sorts, in wholesale; can sell their crops under one management on better terms; can, in short, utilize all the economies which make the agricultural work of communities so successful, without any of their disadvantages. This interferes with no individuality of enterprise,—each man receiving from the common economies pro rata to his individual labor and skill upon his own crops; while it adds all the advantages of a large estate worked by large capital and interested hands. It is no novel or untried experiment. It is the earlier system of every known race, disappearing only in comparatively modern times before the individualistic tendencies of our competitive epoch of civilization; still preserved in many parts of the world, and inevitably to be returned to in order to meet the difficulties of our present situation. In no other way can the small farmer compete with the owners of large lands in applying large capital to their "bonanza farms." These huge farms are growing in the West with dangerous rapidity. Monopolists in land as in trade are forcing cooperation on the smaller men as their only salvation.

Moreover, in such combination for common settlement, regard can be had for the necessary industries of a community. Among the hundred can be counted in the carpenter, the mason, the wheelwright, the blacksmith, etc., so that in dull times for agricultural labor the indispensable works of repair and supply can be carried on to the still further advantage of the community, and the embryo community commence the differentiation of its parts from the very beginning.

Social Advantages of Associated Agriculture.

There are social drawbacks in farming as carried on in our purely individualistic system which lie near the ground of its unpopularity, and which are to be corrected by association. Our farmers live isolated lives, each family in the centre of its fields, shut off by acres, impassable part of the year from the nearest neighbors. The village is not so located as to afford a real centre for social life. From the lack of this social life, the young people leave the homestead and flock to the cities. As a poor soul said who was sent from New York to the country and turned up again in the old quarters after a few months,—"People are more companionable than stumps." The French village is largely a real social centre. The small farmers live close together, and go out to their daily work on their farms, meeting together with their families in the evening. The Mennonites lay out a central village, the lots having narrow frontage on the street, where the house stand, and widening in the rear. East Hampton, Long Island, presents this same feature, dating from its settlement in 1640; and it is occupied to day chiefly by the very families which settled it two hundred and forty years ago! A village laid out in concentric circles, the larger farms on the outer circle, and so narrowing in toward the shops in the central circle, the avenues cutting the circles from centre to circumference like the spokes of a wheel, meets the conditions for social nearness, while allowing wide latitude in size of lots. In some such way the necessity for nearness as the condition for social life must be met, if farming is to be popular. Such associated settlements, moreover, can have the inestimable advantage of systematically laying out the township and securing every condition of well-being. Sanitary science can plan its drainage and make malaria a non-resident. As we ordinarily grow our towns at hap-hazard, there is no uniform system of drainage, and one man's outlay may be wholly neutralized by another man's neglect. Moral science can plan the foundation of the new community so that the after-structure shall follow the lines of purity and temperance. The terms of every land sale can esop the introduction of the worst institutions of our older towns, with their temptations to youth. The tavern, the gambling-den, the brothel, can be prevented from finding a footing. The laws can be so ordered that the early generations of the community shall be trained to habits which shall enact the still stronger unwritten law against the social vices. Thus our New England ancestors stamped on their villages the character which endures in many an uncorrupted community still. Religion's best work for the future is in providing the right social conditions for the magnificent empire which is to rise upon our waste places. The saving effected by the economic advantages of association will alone build and support a thorough school system, the kindergarten for the village little ones, and the common school for the elder children, wherein a true industrial training shall be combined with general education. In the laying out of such a settlement, aesthetics can be considered without perceptible cost, and the future village be made beautiful as well as thrifty, feeding the imagination as well as the purse. Beauty is as cheap as ugliness. It only costs thought. Give Nature a trellis or plan on which to run out her richness, and every village may become picturesque, every road lovely in embowering shade. Our farmers need not be soul-starved, as too commonly now, amid useful ugliness.

Co-operative Colonization not Communism.

The economic and social disadvantages of country life, as we now know them, are to be overcome by association. The colony is the true type of settlement,—the strength which comes by union. The colony is our objective point,—the colony, with the maximum of associated life consistent with the sacredness of the family and the force of individuality. The sacredness of the individual family, the cornerstone of our civilization, must lie below any plans of associated life; to be irreverently touched by no theorists. Temporary barracks, a simple sort of family hotel, may be a provisional necessity. Co-operative housekeeping may, in such an associated community, and doubtless will, open to our hard-worked American housekeepers great economies in money and labor. But each family is ultimately to rear its own homestead, near enough to each other to allow the advantages of associated life as indicated.

The force of individuality, the actual motivity of our present epoch of civilization, is not to be sacrificed to theory, however noble. Each man must work towards the ownership of his own house and land. But to get that most cheaply, and to put most that makes life worth living into its value when secured, he will combine with others intent on the same goal. There should be association for ownership, individuality in ownership. Marriage and property, the corner-stones of our present order, must be conserved. But each must have its rightful conditions supplied. Childhood and youth must have the environment for a healthful, happy, honorable life provided beforehand. Property must have in advance the limitation thrown around it which will prevent the evil developments, economic and social, which curse our older communities.

Association affords these conditions,—supplements individuality, lifts it to higher and purer life. Co-operation, not communism, is our aim. We do not dream of an ideal society. We labor for a possible improvement of the actual. We would build a community of private homes and a commonwealth of private possessions. Our colonies will plant the American township with its original associative action developed as there is clearly room.

The political features of the original cannot easily be improved. The economic and social elements allow of considerable advance. That development we would foster, bringing all the light of our advanced knowledge to bear on this end. Our colonization, therefore, will be co-operative.

Co-operation the Capital for Colonization.

Co-operation furnishes the principle by which to start colonization, as well as to carry it on. Here and there a wealthy man may plant a colony, and we hope to persuade public-spirited men of means to this sagacious philanthropy. The suffering workers in our crowded cities need not await the slow action of capitalists. They can create their own capital by co-operation. A hundred families can unite their small savings, each family taking a share in a co-operative colonization company. That which is lacking can easily be obtained if there is character and intelligence enough to obtain credit. Loans secured by first mortgages on the land will not be wanting for such an enterprise. A large amount of Eastern capital is now invested in mortgages on Western real estate. Cities are built on bonds. Such a colony's bonds will rate as high as the mushroom cities which are underlaid with paper. We shall urge upon workingmen this solution to the problem of making new homes for themselves where life may smile again with hope. Self-help is the best cure for the wrongs of our workers.

Charity's Chance in Co-operative Colonization.

We propose to lay before our men of means the philanthropic and financial inducements to promote such colonization as we have sketched. A colony such as we have outlined is certainly the best form charity can take. It takes a hundred families from want and wretchedness, and places them where health and comfort may be won. It surrounds one hundred families with the conditions under which their children may grow up innocent, intelligent, industrious. It counts off from prospective pauperism one hundred families, and makes of them, instead of burdens to society, wealth-producers. It lays the foundation for a community whose action shall help the health of the nation. We don't think we are enthusiastic in believing that we shall be able to convince public-spirited citizens that in this planting of wisely-ordered colonies, whereto shall be drafted the idle and discontented and burdensome of our cities, lies the secret of safety for society, and to persuade the philanthropic that herein is the most beneficent charity that can bless the suffering poor of our crowded centres.

The Old-World difficulties are coming upon us. The Old-World remedies must come in with them. Charity will have to study the relief colonization has always presented. Every crowded civilization has relieved itself thus. In the Old World, the State has organized and engineered colonization schemes, legislating land for the idle poor as the only safety-valve for the crowded cities. Voluntary action with us may take the place of State action. Again, co-operation furnishes capital the chance for this wisest charity, and the joint stock company can do what the government did of old.

Capital's Chance in Co-operative Colonization.

The colony such as outlined offers an investment whose security capital will not be slow to appreciate when rightly presented. Land has always been held the safest form of investment, when not a fancy speculation. Nothing is securer than a first mortgage on real estate, carefully placed. It is a claim prior to all obligations. The land cannot be made away with. It cannot explode, collapse, or default. It is always there. Select the land wisely, place upon it at once a body of picked men interested in its speedy and complete development, putting their own all into its culture, and capital is secured as no ordinary enterprise can make it. Its principal cannot be touched. Its interest is made certain by the fact that workers are industrial partners, receiving no wages, depending on the yield to pay themselves. The success of the colony returns the investment, after due interest, in a few years. Its failure leaves in the hands of the capitalists the original land plus all the labor that has been bestowed by the unfortunate colonists upon it. We are satisfied that when capitalists are convinced that the land has been intelligently selected, and the colonists carefully chosen, they will be ready to subscribe to such enterprises. That care in locating the site and picking the material for our colonies we propose to provide. Thus we expect to secure the capital for our colonies. The management of these joint stock colony companies will differ according to the plan of the organization. A colony in which the colonists form their own capital will, of course, have the whole management in their own hands. A joint stock company, the shares of which are held by capitalists in New York, can take various degrees of management, according to the circumstances of the enterprise. They may buy the land, plan the settlement, lay out roads, erect temporary structures for the colonists, provide the necessary arrangements for the provisional stages of the undertaking, and each colonist buy from the company on easy terms, subject to the general stipulations of the settlement; the colony being wholly self-regulating from the start, as in ordinary settlements, only with the inestimable advantage of wise foundation and uniform plan in the settlement. Or, at the other extreme, the capitalist company can manage the colony very much as an ordinary joint stock company would work any agricultural estate,—having a resident manager in the settlement, the whole farming operations being carried on under one head, the colonists being "hands" temporarily, only receiving instead of wages all the profits accruing to the enterprise, after the payment of interest to the capitalists, divisible each man pro rata to the returns of his individual labor on his own lot; each man thus coming into possession of his own homestead after a few years, according to the industry and skill he displays; the local administration of affairs passing into the hands of the colony as a certain number of its settlers become independent land-owners.

The class of men composing the colony, and the industrial character of the settlement, would determine the degree in which one or the other of these systems would be adopted. The more intelligent and self-helpful the class of colonists, the less direction would be necessary. But in any system, the general shaping of the features of the settlement would be determined by the minds planning it, with the co-operation of the intending settlers as far as practicable. The co-operative spirit will run through the whole enterprise, and seek the utmost development possible. Colonists will be always encouraged to take stock in the enterprise, even when the capital is furnished by a company in the city. One proviso will be rigidly enforced in any company gotten up by our Association which will ensure its not becoming or even seeming a land speculation: Capital will have its return definitely fixed, beyond which it cannot go. If the land of the settlement be sold in the outset to individual settlers, it will be at fixed prices, at fixed rates of interest where mortgages are taken, in small farms, to separate buyers, with stipulations of immediate improvement; so that neither the company starting the colony nor the early colonists can go into the scheme for speculative purposes. If the capitalist company hold the bonds of the colony as a whole, it will be at a fixed rate of interest. Our scheme shall not be suspected of any fancy character. The details of management need not be considered in advance. They present no special difficulty.

Our Permanent Action.

Our Association is committed to no pet scheme. It has no hobbies. If it prospers according to our hopes, we will try different plans in years to come. We hope within the year to be in readiness to launch our first colony. During the summer our society will be working in each of the preliminary directions, preparing the data from which to select the location for our initial experiment, and, by personal intercourse on the part of our Office Secretary, as well as by correspondence with those thinking of colonizing, preparing the material from which to select our first colonists. At the same time, we are on the lookout for the proper person to act as manager of the colony, requisite in any scheme provisionally, and are digesting the details of organization.

In the autumn, we expect to lay before our men of means the plans for a cooperative colony company in the form of a joint stock association; and we hope during the winter or early in the spring, according as we move South or West, to start forth our first-born. Should this experiment prosper we shall follow it with others in successive years; each having probably some special feature of its own; each colony being under the management of its own association. Our own Association, according to its full name, "The Cooperative Colony Aid Association," reserves to itself the rôle of foster-fatherhood. With the launching into life of one bantling, it can take a new charge upon its hands. We can thus make the planting of colonies a permanent work. Our hope is to accomplish a species of philanthropic plumbing, and fashion a permanent escape-pipe for the overflow of our crowded centres, through which their stagnating accumulations of human energy may pour out over our waste places, sweetening into purity as they spread upon the earth, and fertilizing it till the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. There is a chronic choking of the crowded centres of civilization in our competitive civilization. No spasmodic action of relief can meet the case. The social structure needs the construction of a permanent provision for draining off the surplus supply of labor. The social mechanism needs an ever-acting arrangement for saving the human waste thrown down, and converting it into self-supporting, wealth-producing lives. It is a great aim. Difficulties are plentiful. We are not blind to them. Our eyes are upon the past with its successes and failures. Of failures there are abundance,—enough to prevent any rash confidence. But there is in nearly every instance some discoverable error which can be avoided. Accidental mistakes need not prejudice the idea. Colonization is no experiment. In some form, it is the world-old method of relieving over-population. Its history is full of magnificent successes as well as deplorable failures. Our own country is the living example of successful colonization. We have but to follow the track of historical experiments to discover the shoals on which colonies have been wrecked, and the channels of action wherein there is safety for new voyages. We shall study carefully before we move. When we move we shall move, not in the direction of our intuitions, laying our course by a priori notions of what the world ought to be, but by actual observation of what it is, as laid down by the pathway of our predecessors. We don't feel that we have ventured upon any utopian scheme. What has been done can be done again. What all the world has done our nineteenth century can do. What has been done hastily, crudely, theoretically, and failed, can be done carefully, thoroughly, practically, and succeed. Now, as heretofore, round one successful example, imitators will spring up. If we thrive, other cities will form local colonization aid societies or enter into alliance with our Association, which by its constitution is tied to no local action, and may grow into a central national society, with branches in the different cities. Our full aim is to make CO-OPERATIVE COLONIZATION an integral part of our social system.—The Worker.

TO THE CAPITALISTS.

BY FELIX ADLER.

What is everybody's business is always to some extent nobody's business. That the condition of a large number of the working people is far more wretched than it need be, every intelligent person knows. The wonder is, that we bear so patiently the ills of these fellow human-beings. To declaim against selfishness, however, is the merest waste of words. Much the wiser course it were to move right on in the direction of practical philanthropy, and to trust to the force of good example for support and imitation. After all, it is not so much hard-heartedness as a sort of moral laziness that prevents changes for the public good from being undertaken.

There are some persons in New York who are now determined to make an effort to lighten somewhat the distress of the laboring class, and who believe that colonization is the immediate step to be taken to this end. In the face of many serious difficulties, they propose to put their shoulders to the wheel, and invite and urge the men of means in the community to lend their active assistance to the movement.

The following reasons suggest themselves why capitalists should take an earnest interest in colonization:—

1. The surplus laborers while remaining in the cities are idle consumers, but if transplanted to the country they might become active producers. Here they diminish the wealth of the nation; there they might add to it.

2. The evil of a periodical glut of the labor market calls for special attention, because it is not a temporary one. It is likely to continue so long as the present industrial system lasts. For a permanent evil, there must be a permanent remedy. Colonization offers such a remedy.

3. The rich man is the steward of the wealth he holds. The suffering of the poor is appalling. In vain we give, and give largely; for we do not help. Wherever we probe the surface of poverty, we come upon want of employment as the underlying cause. For charity's sake, therefore, we must resort to colonization.

4. The Colonization Movement is of immense present importance, because, apart from what it may directly accomplish, it will be a sign of real sympathy on the part of the capitalists with the working people. I do not think that the sober workmen and workingwomen of this country favor revolution. I am convinced that their spirit is law-abiding. But we must not tax their patience too greatly. Indifference on the part of the rich is a crime. It breeds a rebellious despair in the hearts of the poor. If it is sadly true that any change for the better in their lot must be slow, let us at least show to the sufferers that we honestly desire the change, and are seriously intent on finding the ways and means to bring it about. The Colonization Movement will conciliate, and that is perhaps the greatest service it can now render.—The Worker.

SOCIALISM.

MR. FLORIAN PAUL OUTLINES THE PURPOSES OF THE SOCIAL DEMOCRATS.—PRINCE BISMARCK'S POLICY SHARPLY CRITICIZED.

A large and intelligent audience met in the Turn Halle last evening to hear Mr. Florian Paul, a social democrat, whom the German government drove out of Berlin, speak on socialism. Mr. Paul opened his remarks, which were delivered in German, by saying: Most of you know who I am. I have had the honor of being treated as an enemy of our fatherland. If I speak somewhat sharply of Germany, you will forgive me, for I have seen her dark side. I am a workman, not a soft-handed and smooth-tongued agitator, and speak accordingly.

I need not remind you that the condition of German workmen is no better than it was before the revolution of 1848. The war against Denmark, the war against Austria, and the war against France, all brought success to Prussia. What was the consequence? The nation fell down and worshipped Bismarck, but the people had to pay the cost of the wars. When this mighty Bismarck met with opposition, he threatened to withdraw, and not a man dared to say, "You can go." Had I, a common weaver, been there, I would have said, "If Bismarck had never been born into this world, the world would have gone on, and the world can get on without him now." All Germans, all friends of Germany, rejoiced at the issue of the war of 1870; but now who can deny that it was a loss to Germany and a gain to France? What did Germany gain? She went up one step in the political world and became an empire. That was all. Hundreds of German brothers shed their blood on French battle-fields, that the land which now treads them under foot and draws her strength from their labor might be called an empire. At this time, the Ultramontanes, while protesting against Bismarck's policy, kept within the law. What did he do? He went before the Reichstag, and said you must make a special law; and they did it. Then the social democrats troubled him. A new Reichstag was called. The social-democratic party was prevented from holding meetings; their ballots were confiscated, and returned to them only after the election was over. Under such circumstances, a Reichstag was elected which gave this almighty minister power to cast out his enemies. Is he a great statesman who knows how to annex lands, but knows not how to raise the people he has annexed? Do we not all know that France is socially better off than Germany to-day? [Applause.] What shall I say of a statesman who gives the provinces which he holds by force alone [applause] less freedom than they had before?

But I come to the principles of socialism; for, be it noted, social democracy is based on principles, not on force of arms. What do our opponents say? They say, first, that we do not want to work: we only want to divide. [Laughter.] Is this true? No. The right of property we will not disturb; we only attack the methods by which property is acquired; we believe in "common work for the common good." It seems to some of the upper ten thousand that this is something new. Not so new, after all. Paul said: "He who will not work shall not eat." We say: "He who will not help the community should not live by it." Fichte said: "Every man has a right to property, provided it be property with which he can subject no one else."

The humanists, then, are on our side. Our opponents are the real "dividers"; they would share the results of our labors, but lift no finger to the work themselves. They say we want anarchy. We want the foundations of the State undisturbed, but we want the rubbish that has accumulated cast off. We want no State which shall be simply an "insurance company for the rich"; we want no State where one man is rich enough to bribe and another is poor enough to be bribed. They say we are all atheists; that we would do away with religion. No; to us religion is a private matter; a man may believe in a God with three hands or in a God with one eye; if he is in sympathy with our political principles we welcome him. It is true that a majority of our party tend toward freethinking rather than toward fanaticism. What can we do when we see the various sects each with a God of its own, and each trying to overthrow the gods of all the others? Christianity in its essence we do not oppose, but churchcraft and priestcraft have changed it, and them we do oppose. The common love that Jesus taught is lost sight of in the hate of the sects. Our religion is freedom, equality, and brotherhood. "Who says he loves God and yet hateth his brother is a liar."

What we want is the real, true religion of humanity; the Catholic Church should have said: "These social democrats want a real brotherly love; let us help them." Instead of that she casts us out. We want no religion that wastes its time in discussing just what kind of fire burns in hell; we want a religion that sees in every man a brother. We want direct income-taxes; we want protection for workmen in factories; we want restrictions put upon the labor of women and children; we want an eight-hour law. [Applause.] The speaker then illustrated the working of such a law, and closed by saying, "If the workmen had time at their disposal, they could so raise themselves that they could help bring nearer the time when brotherly love shall rule. It is time to free ourselves from the chains that have bound us for so many centuries." The speaker was often interrupted by applause, and seemed to have the full sympathy of his audience.—Boston Herald, July 8.

REFORMATORY SCHOOLS.

Occasional troubles at reformatory and correctional institutions like our House of Refuge invite study of methods of discipline. Both in this country and abroad, experience has shown that the best results are attained by schools in the country, where agricultural labor furnishes employment in the open air, and the distance from city life and temptations secures immunity from the risks that require seclusion. The school that is now almost universally recognized and accepted as the type and model is that at Mettray, near Tours, in France; and the story of its growth and its results is well worth studying. Thirty years ago two Frenchmen, M. de Metz, a judge, who had made a tour of inspection of reform schools for boys, and M. de Courtelles, an officer of the army, gave up their positions and determined to devote themselves to the work of establishing a reform school that should really answer to its name.

De Metz had seen, near Hamburg, in Germany, the school established by Pastor Wichern, where the plan of collecting the boys into families of a dozen was in successful operation. This he made the basis of his new school, and from that day to this it has continued to work successfully. The school now numbers eight hundred boys, and these are all gathered into families of forty each, with its head and two "elder brothers," chosen by the boys themselves from among their own number. Then de Metz put in operation a thorough system of supervision over the boys after they leave the school, and every boy is free to come back to it, to spend Sundays with his old family, to be taken care of if he is sick, and to find shelter and employment until a place can be had where he can support himself.

Thirty-nine hundred boys have passed through Mettray, and over seventy-five thousand dollars have been spent in caring for these boys in late years; and thus, between the family spirit that is established at the school, and the family tie that is maintained afterward, the proportion of recidivists for second offences has been reduced to four per cent. from the old standard of seventy-five per cent. Now the number of boys that go out of Mettray with a good character is large enough to make quite an important contribution to the labor market of the neighborhood, and, as more than two-thirds of them are farmers, they find employment and good wages when others are idle. The very fact that their early youth was neglected and perverted makes it the more gratifying that the training at Mettray sends them out into the world good and useful men. That this is well done, is largely due to the fact that their care and education are entrusted to men of culture, who have determined, in the spirit of the founders, to devote themselves to this work in earnest.

At the very outset, for a year before a single boy was received at Mettray, there was a training school for the teachers and superintendents; and that school is still in active, useful operation, while the present superintendent is one of the first class that thus was fitted for the work which has occupied his whole lifetime. These officers receive a hundred and twenty-five dollars a year, and their reward, apart from the consciousness of the excellence of the work they are employed in, is largely found in being selected to establish and manage similar institutions elsewhere; and reform schools on the type of that of Mettray now exist throughout Europe as well as in this country. These have all been established upon the plan of Mettray, with no walls to keep the boys in, with no gates to shut them up, all roads open. There has been a single escape from Mettray since the establishment of the school in 1839, and even in the last ten years the attempts to escape have diminished from two and one-half per cent. to one and one-half, while in other reform schools in France nearly one-half of the escapes have been successful, in spite of walls and gates; in short, the lesson taught is that the boy who comes from the worst haunts of Paris, or the vicious purlieus of other French towns, learns that safety and happiness are found at Mettray. The average stay there is a little over two years; yet in that time the boys who come there steeped in ignorance, and in many cases in vice, have been put in the way of getting a fair elementary education, and one-third were returned to their families as repentant, or discharged honorably, carrying with them the substantial reward of their good conduct in money earned by work and as prizes. Music, gymnastics, military drill, training in the use of fire-engines, in addition to farm work, and such trades as are incidental to a population of eight hundred boys and their teachers and care-takers are taught, in addition to elementary instruction. The mortality among these boys, coming in all sorts of unwholesome conditions, was a half per cent. in 1876, a quarter per cent. in 1875; and this speaks of itself in the highest praise of the sanitary excellence of Mettray and its hygienic management. Towards its support the government gives about one-half the very moderate cost at so much per day for each boy,—about ninety dollars a year is the total,—and the balance is made up by the earnings of the institution from the wages of the boys, from the sale of the crops grown on its own property, and from the income derived from endowments, subscriptions, and gifts. Many of its buildings bear the names of cities and towns, of corporations and individuals, that have contributed to build them.

Mettray provides rewards, in a class of honor, in appointments of the boys as assistants, in rewards in money and in kind, and in distinction to the "family" that does best; but it also has a long list of punishments, prominent among them solitary confinement in a dark or a light cell, with bread and water, near enough, however, to the chapel to take part in all religious services. Then there is a regular scale of other penalties,—the boy is either reprimanded in private or in public, prohibited from play, confined to close quarters, deprived of all honors, degraded from the class of honor, sent to a cell, and finally to a dungeon, for persistent rebellious conduct; or, in case of a total failure of any improvement, committed to a prison. The boys sent to solitary confinement are, however, set to work every day, either at cutting wood or breaking stones, so as to have sufficient exercise; and frequent visits from the officers, with the means of reading and writing, enable them to keep their minds active. The example of such a school as Mettray may well be taken to heart by those who have to do with the same class here,—the bad boys, who are thus taken in hand and saved from the consequences of utter neglect, or, even worse, the evil influences of a vicious or criminal home. It is proved that, by subdivision into small groups, family ties may be revived or even created; and by making the reform school a refuge for the boy who has gone out of it into the world, its wholesome influence still shields and protects him. To secure its great advantages, the same conditions must exist; and these are mainly the excellent character and thorough training of the officers, the selection of a good site in the country, where there will be plenty of open-air farm-work for the boys and a fair demand for the labor of those who have left, and, above all, a steadfast perseverance in a sound system of discipline, including both rewards and punishments in due proportion, serving both as examples and as a warning alike to good and bad.—Philadelphia Ledger, June 27.

NERVOUS DEBILITY.

One cannot take up a newspaper without being confronted with an advertisement of some cure or palliation for nervous debility. The malady seems to be as prevalent in the Northern States, at least, as catarrh or consumption or skin diseases. A writer in a recent number of the Atlantic finds a prime cause of this universal complaint in the dryness of our American climate, and in the sudden and constant electrical changes of the atmosphere consequent upon this dryness. This view is unintentionally perhaps confirmed by another writer in the last issue of the same monthly in an article entitled "English Skies," which are far less stimulating, far more tranquillizing, than our American skies.

However this may be, our habits of living do not tend toward neutralizing whatever over-stimulating influences our climate exerts upon us. On the contrary, we call to their aid whatever power there is in tea, coffee, alcohol, social excitement, competition, fashion, and wealth to spur us on to still greater and greater exertion. In our large cities men and women are beginning to find that there is a limit to exertion, that vacations are a necessity. But in rural districts these are unknown. The farmer's wife knows nothing about a vacation. She plods steadily and wearily on from June till June again. The farmer himself is content to wear out in the rut, so he can pay off the mortgage or add more acres to his farm. So with the mechanic and the merchant's wife. To add to the hoard laid by for a rainy day, to dress as smartly as their neighbors, to get a new piece of furniture, they forego holidays and vacations. And there are multitudes who wear themselves out in struggling against the tide of adversity which bears them away in spite of all their efforts. In one form or another the search for the Philosopher's Stone, the Elixir of Life, the Fountain of Perpetual Youth, continues through the ages. There are those now who really think that there is or may be something one can "take" which will restore the tissue of wasted nerve, which will bring back brain power, which will give again the health that has been squandered by over-exertion, by going without sleep, by indulgence in stimulants, by excesses of various sorts, by continuous violation of hygienic laws. But there is no such thing. Wasted health is like wasted time—irrecoverable. We may build on what is left, but what is gone is gone forever.

Now if our climate makes us peculiarly nervous and sensitive we should certainly counteract this tendency by every means in our power; we should cultivate whatever will make us less sensitive, less nervous; we should avoid stimulants and excitements, and conserve by every means within our reach our nervous power. There are various ways in which we may do this. Early, regular, sufficient sleep, abundance of plain, nutritious, and well-cooked food, avoidance of all stimulating beverages, proper adjustment of the clothing to changes in temperature and moisture, habitual indulgence in simple but satisfying pleasures, avoidance of close, hot rooms at all seasons of the year,—these are some of the requisites that make health sure to the well, and restore it or build it up again in those who are sick. These conditions are unfortunately not within the reach of all, but they may be secured by a great many who suffer from the want of them now when their importance is fully understood and recognized.—New York Tribune, June 25.

CHRISTIANITY AND JUDAISM.

On a recent Saturday Rabbi Sal, of Har Sinai Synagogue, Baltimore, delivered a peculiar sermon, an outline of which, with comments, appears in the Episcopal Methodist of that city. The rabbi advocated the theory of development in religion as well as in Nature, and insisted on the doctrine of the "survival of the fittest." Overleaping all the barriers of Jewish exclusivism, and overleaping himself, he became liberal even to the broadest latitudinarianism. So accommodating was his humor that he ignored the claims of any particular religion to peculiar sacredness, insisting that the only tolerant religion was not that intended for all humanity, but that which adapted itself to different phases of thought and different stages of human progress. He held that men ought to be allowed to suit themselves as to their religious belief; that what met the demands of one age and people would be wholly unsuited to another. He even went so far as to recognize Christianity as an advance upon Judaism. Laying violent hands upon the very ark itself, containing the Book of the Law, he spoke of the Jewish system as effete and dying out when the new religion supplanted it. But he thought that Christianity had about had its day and was not exactly up to the present era of advanced thought. The Episcopal Methodist says there were intimations in his discourse that the Rabbi believes in what Carlyle terms "the gospel of dirt," and that he is evidently disposed to deify the forces of Nature and do away with the providence if not the very nature of God. For instance, he is reported as saying: "With the enlightenment we have received the last four centuries, modern reason cannot admit the idea of omnipotence towering above Nature and bound by no law of Nature. This is not only true of those who cannot conceive of God after the analogy of human self-consciousness, and hence deny Him personality and finite restricting attributes, but also of those who do admit the analogy." No materialist could ask a greater concession than this. It is a lamentable indication of the extent to which the modern Hebrew has wandered from the faith of his fathers. In rejecting the teachings of his own Scriptures concerning the Messiah he has well-nigh abandoned all forms of religious belief.—New York Herald, June 30.

SCENES IN THE DAILY LIFE OF A ST. PETERSBURGER.

SCENE, St. Petersburg.
Janitor.—I can't stand this any longer, sir. I don't mind doing the duties ordinarily expected of one in my position, but I cannot be on the watch all the twenty-four hours to see that the Nihilists don't stick revolutionary posters on the front wall. I have gone eleven nights without sleep now.
Proprietor.—But, my poor Ivan Ivanovitch, I did not make the law which all owners of houses are obliged to obey, providing for a fine of five hundred roubles if a placard is posted up on the premises, and imprisonment if the offence is repeated. Here, drink this coffee: it will keep you awake. To-night I will go on watch, and you can get a good sleep.
Jan.—Thanks, my good master. Your noble consideration lends me new strength.
(An hour later the janitor comes in to breakfast.)
Prop.—Great Todleben (a popular Russian exclamation, much like our own "Great Scott")! Where have you been? Why, man, there is a revolutionary placard on your back!
Jan.—Is there! I suppose I must have closed my eyes for a minute or two. They have a keen eye for business, those Nihilists. Let's tear it up.
Prop.—No; don't tear it up, because some of the fragments might be found and we might be sent to Siberia. Burn it up, coat and all; I'll give you a new one. Now, go back to your post, and for the love of heaven do not doze a wink.
(The janitor returns. The proprietor watches him from the window, and whenever he returns shouts: "Now, then, Ivan Ivanovitch, keep awake!" In the course of the long, long weary day the police arrive.)
Official.—We have come to search the premises.
Prop.—But, Count, I belong to no association. I am merely a peaceful citizen, who passes his days and nights watching to see that his watchman doesn't fall asleep.
Of.—I have Gen. Gourko's orders to enter your house and see that you have no concealed arms.
Prop.—All I have is an old shot-gun without lock, stock, or barrel.
Of.—The Nihilists could easily furnish you those. Your shot-gun is confiscated, and you may thank your lucky stars that you get off so easily. What's in that drawer?
Prop.—Knives.
Of.—Knives! I confiscate them.
Prop.—But, Prince, they are table-knives, and to-night I give a dinner-party; my daughter is engaged to be married, and this is to celebrate her betrothal.
Of.—You must eat with your fingers,—that's all.
Prop.—But, Grand Duke, how are we to carve the fowl?
Of.—Tear 'em in pieces or bite out chunks; it'll all be in the family. Where's your bedroom?
Prop.—Here, your Imperial Excellency; and if you find any deadly weapon in it I want to be sent to Siberia.

Of.—I might send you there if it were worth the trouble, for here is a razor which in the practised hands of a desperate man might be used to slay the whole imperial family. I will confiscate the razor.

(The family dinner, though, takes place under disadvantages, and the unhappy man forgets all the trials and troubles of the day. At the dessert, just as he is about to propose the health of the soon-to-be-bedded pair, he receives a note couched in these terms):—

You are a traitor. You have to-day given up to the tyrants the arms in your possession. You have therefore been doomed to death by

The Executive Committee

(Per TOMSKI COLINSOVITCH).

Prop. (tearing his hair)—There! That's all that was lacking to make it complete. Read that.

His Future Son-in-law.—You are wrong, sir; there is a good deal to be said on both sides.

Prop.—Wrong, was I? Perhaps you are a Nihilist (with bitter sarcasm)?

His Future Son-in-law.—I have the honor to be the chief of Section 217, and I do not care who knows it.

His Daughter.—Yes, pa, and that is why I lo-ho-hove him. (Casts herself into her lover's arms.)

Prop.—Merciful heavens! Are you a Nihilist, too, Paulovna?

His Daughter.—Yes, pa; and so are my sisters and my cousins and my aunts.

All of the Guests.—And so are we, all of us.

Prop.—I will denounce you to the authorities. Call the police!

His Future Son-in-law.—If you utter one word I will fire this train and blow up the house, which we had mined as a precaution lest the police should make a descent on us while we were at dinner.

Prop.—And here I have been passing my days and nights keeping watch on my janitor.

Omnes.—Your janitor! Ho! ho! Look out of the window and see what your janitor is doing.

Prop.—May I be knouted and sent to Siberia if my janitor isn't covering the whole front of the house with four-sheet revolutionary posters. [Faints].—New York World, translation from the French.

PRESIDENT ELIOT, in his recent commencement address at Smith College, laid much stress upon the importance of an English education. He said: "I may as well abruptly avow, as the result of my reading and observation in the matter of education, that I recognize but one mental acquisition as an essential part of the education of a lady or gentleman,—namely, an accurate and refined use of the mother-tongue. Greek, Latin, French, German, mathematics, natural and physical science, metaphysics, history, and aesthetics are all profitable and delightful, both as training and as acquisitions, to him who studies them with intelligence and love; but not one of them has the least claim to be called an acquisition essential to a liberal education or an essential part of a sound training."

INNOVATION.

What is this thing ye fear
To yet behold?
A beast, a somewhat blear,
Hateful, untold?
Why shrink the days to come
More than those fled?
Why cry thy grief, the sum
Of hope made dead?
The doubt uncertain lies
Upon all hearts;
Love hopes where hate denies
Or weakness starts.
The fixed hand of the past
Points on: Oh, heed
As mariners hold fast
The chart they need!
The past hath made the glass
The present keeps:
Through it we look alas!
To future deeps
Dim as half-night; unwise,
The soul doth seek
To see with futile eyes,
Through power weak.
Oh, restless be of—doubt,
Yet lose thy fear!
For truth ventures not out
With cowards near!

The Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 7, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLKDO Office, No. 35 MONROE STREET: J. T. FRET, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual National Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social National Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; (i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

THE AID OF THE TYPES.

In these days of the printing press and popular literature, every great cause or public reformation that would advance must avail itself of these agencies for its propagation. It is especially important it should have a periodical or journal that may afford a record of current events which sustain a relation to it, a medium for the communication and interchange of views among those of its fellowship, and of intelligence and exposition in regard to its principles. It has been the aim of THE INDEX to supply, according to the abilities and means at its command, such a desideratum to rationalists, as indeed it is to be presumed has been the case, in their respective ways, of all the freethought journals. But all of them, in certain respects, are unable to cope with their leading secular and church contemporaries. All of them present sad illustrations of the doctrine of a "struggle for existence," with much uncertainty as to its consequent outcome, "the survival of the fittest." There are none of them, lamentable and humiliating as is the confession, that lead more than a precarious existence. There are various reasons for this. One of them, perhaps the principal one, results from the fact that there are few radicals, comparatively, who have a deep sense of obligation to contribute to the pecuniary support of these auxiliaries for the propagation of their convictions. Hence our radical journals are hampered and crippled for want of money to make them what else they might be. There is no scarcity of able, learned, and accomplished expositors of liberalism. The profoundest thinkers and leaders in science, philosophy, and literature of the age are on its side. But all of them have their bread to earn, and are therefore compelled to resort to those channels of communication with the public which offer the best mediums for making their genius and ideas effective and the largest assurance in respect to remuneration. As a consequence of this, owing to the impoverishment of rationalistic journals, a very large number of the most gifted liberal writers of the day are absorbed by the secular or religious press. Both of these, understanding well the drift of the intelligence of the time, sagaciously adapt their columns to these tendencies. Hence it is not uncommon in our secular journals, as well as the religious ones, to read from time to time, if not even in the same issue, articles from wholly opposite poles of thought and view. Of course, this is not without its compensation to the rationalistic cause, since it is thus necessarily advanced, though it may not be under its own name, or in so straightforward or consistent a manner. Of those upon whom our liberal journals are forced to depend for writers, if we count out the editors there is probably scarcely a single instance in which those who contribute to their columns are not regularly engaged in other pursuits. What they do in this way is purely from their love of the cause, often at great sacrifice,—the expense of overburdening energies which are severely taxed already, and without compensation. This circumstance, which is not peculiar to purely rationalistic journals, but also to reformatory ones in general, of all descriptions, is attended with serious drawbacks and difficulties which the liberal public cannot fully realize or appreciate. Of those who, under the influence of an impulse of transient enthusiasm, excitement, or a deliberate sense of duty, pledge themselves to such assistance, very few continue in this kind of well-doing to the end. It is very natural. Their customary occupations make nearly or quite all the demand upon them they can respond to. We are all disposed to shrink from burdens from which we can conscientiously escape. Some one else, they think, will do the work even if they fail; or the cause will survive the delinquency at least, and hence the claim is ere long dismissed from further consideration. There is another class, however, of faithful workers in behalf of our liberal journals who deserve a better tribute in this connection. There are a few who, with all the pressure of other exacting employments, at the sacrifice of time which might be turned to desirable account, and compensation which their labors in other ways would bring, out of a pure devotion to the cause of which they are the noble representatives continuously give to such disinterested service a measure of their energies to the end. They are those who may be counted on when all others fail.

But with all the aid which comes from such support, our liberal journals necessarily suffer much in quality from the circumstances that have been indicated. There is, it seems to us, imperative need of a journal of rationalism that shall surpass any which at present exist or it has possessed; that shall in every particular be up to the most advanced standard of journalism to-day; that shall include within its scope, with less or greater fulness, a recognition of what is transpiring in all its leading correlated and converging lines of interest, not in one country alone, but all over the world; with appropriate contributions, so far as they could be procured, from the foremost living thinkers. A paper thus conducted, instead of being under the charge of a single editor, would include several, each after the plan of the principal secular and religious journals, presiding over a special department. If any one is disposed to regard this as a visionary suggestion, we readily concede it is such, without adequate pecuniary resources to put it in operation; but only with that admission. We have no doubt as to the success of the enterprise, if it could be thus amply and vigorously undertaken. Nay, to put aside all disinterested and reformatory purposes, if it be possible to contemplate it on so low a level, we have such faith in the growing and already sufficiently strongly-developed rationalistic tendencies and yearnings of the time as to believe that as a mere matter of business an organ of rationalism conducted on the plan at which we have hinted would prove a good paying investment to the capitalist, and an unquestionable success to all concerned. We wish it to be clearly understood in saying this that we intend no reflection on the liberal journals extant. They will compare favorably with those which are more fortunate in the elements of success to which we have alluded. Indeed, it is a surpassing wonder, to those who are familiar with their experience in these respects, that they are able to sustain so high a degree of excellence. But still we are constrained to the conviction, believing, as heretofore intimated in other particulars, that in concentration of energy, or union, there is strength, that if, instead of several weak and struggling ones, we could have one abundantly equipped and flourishing organ of rationalism such as we have described, the interests of the cause would be much more effectively promoted than at present.

But not only does rationalism need to avail itself of the aid of the printing-press in respect to journalism as a means of its propagation, but also for other modes of publication and missionary effort. We need the publication of brief statements or tracts of the principles of rationalism in larger quantity, and to some extent of an improved quality to what we have produced, to be freely scattered broadcast over the land wherever those can be reached who are disposed to assist in the work. Then we need manuals of instruction for free Sunday-schools and the home, in all the various departments of the whole round of ethical science and teaching. These, and much more, which time and necessity would call into requisition, would be found to be of exceeding potency and effect in the direction toward which we have been looking. They are things which radicals should work for, and towards which aspire, even though they fail to compass them in more than an insignificant degree. They are certainly those it is well for rationalism to consider in connection with its proposal for more constructive effort.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL LESSONS.

The Springfield Republican contained, a short time since, a very sensible editorial upon this subject. It took precisely the same view taken by us, in the columns of THE INDEX some months ago, in regard to a certain plan of Sunday-school lessons, known as the International series, which has become very popular among Orthodox people for such teaching. "This course," it remarked, "is in use by Sunday-schools which include several millions of children.

The subjects for this month are Ezekiel's prophecy of the destruction of Tyre (chapter 26, verses 7-14); Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones (chapter 37, verses 1-10); Zechariah's prophecy of the golden candlestick (chapter 4); and the last half of the third chapter of Malachi. Of the multitude of teachers who with patience and toil have sought to inwardly digest these passages, and get some nutriment from them, we should like to ask, How much have you found that was in itself adapted to guide and help an average American child into better ways of living? The "root trouble" of the whole system, it was maintained, is in "the assumption that the exclusive material for the direct religious instruction of children is to be found in the Bible." "Even the matchless precepts and stories of the Gospels lose their inspiring quality when they are endlessly reiterated and mechanically impressed upon children, like the multiplication table or the list of English sovereigns."

From the dry husks and juiceless spiritual pabulum for children which these International lessons supply, it turns with commendation to a series arranged by Unitarians, to which the name has been given of "Unity" lessons. These embrace such subjects as—Pleasant Faces, Teasing and Bantering, Exaggeration, Home Helping, Table Manners, Play, Study, Companions, Old Age, The Poorer, The Cat and Dog, etc., etc.

We do not hesitate to declare our perfect agreement with the writer from whom we have quoted, in respect to the relative estimates which he passes upon these two series of lessons. We rejoice in his wisdom and independence in telling just what he thinks of them. He but reiterates views which have been frequently advanced in this paper, and with which, it is safe to conclude, its readers in general are in sympathy. At the same time, we cannot refrain from the observation that if the author of them, in this instance, had desired to see a practical and flourishing illustration of the kind of Sunday-school lessons which he approves, he might have found one, without travelling a hundred miles from Springfield, many years before the Unity lessons were projected.

The Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., has for sixteen years and more sustained a Sunday-school in which purely practical instruction has been substituted for that of a theological description. The Christian Scriptures have not been discarded, nor have they been permitted to crowd out those of the other great historic religions. The education of these children may have suffered some neglect, it is true, in respect to the Jewish wars, the genealogies and deeds of the patriarchs, and many miraculous things even in the New Testament; but the loss, there is good reason to believe, has been somewhat atoned for by imparting to them, in place of such knowledge, an acquaintance with elementary drawing, natural history, physiology, book-keeping, literature, etc., in connection with subjects like those of the "Unity" lessons. We are gratified by the evidence which these lessons afford that our Unitarian friends are advancing toward radical methods. Radicalism is sure to win in this matter of Sunday-schools, as in other church ones, at last. The world moves, but there are some who move faster than others.

If ONE desired evidence of the doctrine of inherited tendencies, no more conclusive need be sought than the recent edict of the President of the Manhattan Company in respect to the Jews. It shows that the spirit of unreasoning class and race hatred—in a word, that of the Inquisition—survives in this generation, and even in our free America. Fortunately, to the credit of the country and the time be it said, such gross exhibitions of it, as have been recently witnessed, are wholly confined to those types of character whose leading distinctions are a coarse nature and narrow intelligence.

It is especially likely to be characteristic of those whom money or mere business faculty has lifted to places of power and authority. Mr. Corbin disclaims that he has been actuated by race or religious prejudices. But the flimsy pretence which he offers for his flagrant insult to a whole people shows very clearly that, though he may be unconscious of the fact, it is otherwise. That there are rude and ill-behaved people among the Jews as well as others, no one, not even Jews themselves, will deny. There are bores and simpletons everywhere, and among every class; but that there is a larger percentage of these among Jews, we seriously question: and even were this the case, there was no need of Mr. Corbin's undiscriminating proclamation. There were other ways that a person in the position he holds, of ordinary tact and sagacity, not to mention desire to avoid offence to those whose feelings ought to have been considered, could have met the difficulty of which he complains, without resort to the rude and clumsy expedient adopted. The Jewish people have too honorable a history, and are too worthy an element of our American life, to justify such assaults. They are by nature amiable, self-respecting, and respectful to others, and easily induced to conform to any reasonable requirement if properly appealed to. In all the virtues and moralities which go to make up good family life and social order, in intelligence and refinement, ability to excel in learning, science, art, literature, and all the elements of a high civilization, they will compare favorably with any race upon the planet. But there are those so constituted that they are never quite content unless there is somebody they can abuse. They never feel fully assured of their dignity or respectability unless they know that others are deprived to some extent of the privileges and enjoyments they possess. There are in the vicinity of our great cities, and especially within a certain range of New York, popular resorts which can be easily filled up at this season with a snobbish aristocracy, if they can only be assured that those in respect to whom they cherish an unwarranted and ignorant prejudice are excluded. It is manifest this is the class Mr. Corbin aims to attract to Manhattan Beach, and for whom his proscriptive edict is a cunningly devised advertisement. But we are sure he will ere long discover, if he has not already, that he has over-shot the mark; and though he should succeed in adding a few more dollars to the profits of his company for the season, the consequence of the outrage he has perpetrated, not upon Jews alone, but the finer sense of justice and civility in the community in general, will be likely to react upon himself and fix a notoriety to his name that will prove undesirable.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

TENNTSON was threescore years and ten, August 5. THE REV. W. J. PORTER will pass the principal part of his vacation at Grantville, Mass.

JOHN BRIGHT is urged by his friends to make a visit to the United States this summer.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, in his History of Co-operation in England, declares that co-operators waste one-half of their time in answering clerical objectors.

MR. WHITELAW REID, editor-in-chief of the New York Tribune, who has gone to California, has been tendered a breakfast by the members of the press of San Francisco.

REV. J. W. CHADWICK delivered a discourse before the Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., Sunday, July 27th, upon Romanism, Protestantism, and Rationalism.

THE COUNTESS DE MONTJO, the mother of the Ex-Empress Eugénie, is now eighty-three years old, and is bed-ridden and almost blind. The prince imperial was her favorite grandson.

MRS. JULIA WARD HOWE read a paper at Newport, July 28th, at the residence of Prof. W. B. Rogers, before the annual meeting of the Town and Country Club, upon her recent European travels.

MR. GLADSTONE recently maintained in a lecture delivered by him at Eaton College, that the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" were the work of one poet, whose name was Homer, and not of several poets, as it has been thought to be.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD has concluded his Western lecture-tour, and is about entering upon his usual summer vacation. He was to speak at Providence, R.I., Aug. 1st and 2d, at Westerly, R.I., Sunday, Aug. 3; thence to Newport, where he may be addressed during August and September.

DR. JOHANN KARL FRIEDRICH ROSENKRANZ is dead. Dr. Rosenkrantz was Professor of Philosophy at Königsberg University, and published a number of philosophical treatises. He was well known through his superior edition of the works of Immanuel Kant. His age was seventy-four.

MR. DANIEL DAILEY, editor of the Evening News at Jeffersonville, Ind., is an earnest advocate of liberalism. Mr. Dailey has recently lectured in Louisville in the interest of this cause. He contemplates holding a debate in that city in the fall, with Col. James W. Bowles, upon the inspiration of the Christian Scriptures.

WALT WHITMAN presided over a meeting of journalists the other day, the occasion being a farewell to Thomas Coleman, of the Philadelphia Ledger, who was about to start for Europe. There is a rumor that Mr. Whitman is to lecture at Cape May to the summer sojourners there, Col. Forney lending his influence to aid the experiment.

MR. J. L. STODDARD, one of the editorial contributors of THE INDEX, now in Europe, is gathering material for his next season's lecture, which will be "From Madrid to Moscow—the Land of the Cid and the Czar." He has returned from his Spanish trip to Paris, and is en route for Russia, via Baden Baden, Heidelberg, and Hanover.

THE REV. DR. DAVID EINHORN, a venerable and greatly respected Jewish rabbi, delivered recently an impressive farewell discourse at the Temple Beth El, New York, on his retirement from a ministry of thirty-eight years, twenty-three of which have been spent in this country. The ample building was crowded to overflowing upon the occasion.

MR. EMERSON'S lecture on Memory, before the Concord School of Philosophy, attracted so large an audience that it was found necessary to transfer the delivery of it from the "Orchard House," the usual place of resort for the school, to the vestry of the Orthodox church. A number of distinguished people were present, among whom were Senator Hoar, Ex-Secretary Boutwell, Professor Maria Mitchell, of Vassar College.

THE HARTFORD Post says the controversy in regard to the religion of William Lloyd Garrison may be effectually closed "whenever the fact, perfectly well-known hereabouts, is recognized, that Mr. Garrison was simply a Spiritualist, and not a Christian at all. In accordance with this condition of his belief, the observances at his funeral were not un-Christian nor anti-Christian, but simply non-Christian; just as much so, in fact, as those at the burial of the late Mr. Ingersoll, of Illinois. Now an effort has been made, it seems to me, by certain well-meaning persons, to claim that Mr. Garrison must have been a Christian because he was a good man and did good. If this is sound reasoning, there are two things that have got to be revised: our religion and our dictionary. At least this must be true of the Orthodox churches."

PROPHYLACTIC VALUE OF VACCINATION.

A medical correspondent in THE INDEX of July 17 gives it as certain that the preponderant weight of authority is in favor of the prophylactic value of vaccination, where the vaccine virus is properly selected, properly kept, and properly introduced.

It may be so; but in the face of a great mass of testimony to the contrary, we must still be permitted to doubt. The London Lancet, during the 1871-1872 epidemic in England, declared that probably 120,000 vaccinated persons had fallen victims to the disease! "During the same epidemic, 14,808 persons" (I quote from Vaccination Inquirer of May, 1879, published in London) "were admitted to the metropolitan asylums, who were suffering from small-pox, and the attendant doctors recorded no fewer than 11,174 as vaccinated."

Official reports received from various European governments in 1857, by Mr. Simon, the English medical officer of the Privy Council, showed that 153 vaccinated small-pox deaths occurred in Holstein; 5,217 cases of vaccinated small-pox in Austria; 3,178 cases of vaccinated small-pox in Prussia; 19,364 deaths from small-pox in Sweden, with the declaration that vaccination does not confer security against death from small-pox. There were also recorded 1,388 cases of vaccinated small-pox in the Prussian army.

The Parliamentary returns made by the Registrar-General to the House of Commons (No 433, of 1878, published by Hansard, London) entitled, "Vaccination—Mortality," establishes, among other things, that "the general vaccination of the community for a long period has not diminished the average small-pox death rate"; and that "since the vaccination of every child within three months of birth has been enforced, under pain of repeated fine and imprisonment for neglect, the death rate from eight diseases, either inoculable or arising from debility, has increased 1829 per million of all ages, and 24,910 per million among infants under one year, the proportion of such under one to all ages inclusive being 15 to 1."

These statistics seem to be pretty good evidence against the prophylactic power of vaccination.

The fact that certain persons do not have small-pox after being vaccinated is of itself no proof that vaccination is a preventive, as these persons might not have had it in any case. Dr. Kirkpatrick, who wrote when Jenner was a youth, tells us there were many whom it was not possible to inoculate with small-pox, and gives thirty-nine cases of inoculated small-pox producing "no effect." Dr. Wagstaffe, Dr. Friend, Dr. Nettleton, and other English authorities testified to the same purport. Condamine, quoted by Bousquet (Traité de la Vaccine), says that half mankind are insusceptible to small-pox.

But even if vaccination were a preventive under due precautions, how could one ever be sure that such precautions had been taken? It is well known among physicians that the worst of diseases has been communicated by persons on whom there was no external sign of its presence that a skilled physician could detect.

From a number of cases of alleged death by vaccination, I select the following from the Newcastle, England, Daily Chronicle: "An inquest was held on the body of Henry Mould, aged four months. The child was vaccinated and had died. Dr. Abrath, who was present at the inquest, said that 'no one could tell good from bad lymph; no microscope or chemical tests could detect it. He had himself poisoned three children by so-called healthy vaccination lymph, and this made the one hundred and twenty-first case he had seen where children had suffered visibly from vaccination.'"

Dr. J. W. says: "The danger can be wholly averted, since it has become practicable to secure an indefinite supply of pure and fresh virus direct from the heifer." As heifers do not have the pox spontaneously "to order," it is to be presumed that it is to be artificially induced. If this is done by vaccinating the heifer with human vaccine virus, how can one know that the virus was originally pure, and what evidence is there that, if it was not, the helper acts as a filter to purify it?

If the vaccine matter were taken from a cow in which the disease had spontaneously arisen, what security have we that the cow may not have had, either latent or developed, some of the many diseases common among cattle, which might be communicated? Would not the fair presumption be that an animal which could originate so loathsome a disease might communicate some injurious virus?

Your correspondent says: "For the protection of the whole community, the State must demand that no individual be left liable to become a centre of infection for a disease," etc. Now, if the rest of the community are secured by vaccination, it is difficult to see how an unvaccinated person can become a "centre of infection" for small-pox.

If vaccination should prove to be a medical superstition, it will not be the first (as Dr. W. probably knows) which has proved to be such after having been credited for a long period of time, and supported by the concurrent testimonies of those presumably the best-informed on the subject.

THE "POST" AND THE PRINTERS: AN ANTI-STRIKE.

A week or two ago the compositors of the Boston Post, on coming to work one day, were told that their services were no longer required, as another set of men had been engaged in their stead. The compositors thus suddenly dismissed were naturally dissatisfied, and both parties have printed their views. Of course the question is a question of "capital and labor," and has immediate practical interest. Can the case be stated fairly? First: On one point, the parties in their printed manifestoes flatly contradict one another. The compositors say that there was a morally binding agreement that there should be one month's notice of any change in the scale of prices; and the Post proprietors say that there was no such agreement, nor any one authorized to make it. This element of the question, therefore, as we give entire credence to both parties, must be omitted. Second: The compositors, in the resolutions passed at the Faneuil Hall meeting of Saturday, July 28, argue their case exclusively upon this claim of a broken engagement. But evidently the further argument of hardship and injustice of a dismissal without notice is valid, as far as it goes. To this second argument, the proprietors of the Post, in an editorial of the 17th, do in fact reply. They say that the compositors could any or all of them leave at pleasure, and that the paper was equally free to dismiss them, and that if there is any hardship in the case, there is a "union" which is well able to assist them. Third: The proprietors now argue further on their own side, that they had a perfect right to make the present more economical contract for composition, that they did it suddenly and secretly in order to avoid the risk of a strike, and that they have now employed non-union men in order "to emancipate the Post from the thralldom of the union," and that these considerations outweighed the mere question of courtesy. They prefer, they say, to deal in their own business with individuals, and not with an outside organization. Fourth: The printers and other trades-unions now "pledge themselves to withhold all support from the Post, its subscribers and advertisers" (these are our own italics), "and to use all our influence against the paper"; and they use threats against the Democratic party unless it repudiates as a party the action of the Post.

It is obvious that the matter is now in a very mixed state. We think it clear that the subscribers and advertisers ought not to have been threatened, however, any more than the "sisters and the cousins and the aunts" of the Post. Here was a mistake. On the question of the political party, we do not say a word. Working printers are, as a matter of fact, not at present paid as well as would be desirable; and it may be that the cooperative method, which the proprietors of the Post say, has vainly been urged upon the compositors, would have been a good one: though without knowledge of the details this cannot be decided. Further: the question of increasing the wages of workmen is a difficult one; for no employer can afford to pay more than market rates in the present state of competition, and the attempt to hold up wages by authority of a third party to the bargain of employer and workman (viz., the trades-union) is certainly only a temporary expedient. It may sometimes do good; but no such method can be permanently beneficial: it is against human nature. Two parties to one bargain are quite as many as human bargains will commonly bear. We do not see that the reconciliation of capital and labor is provided for yet. What does the Church say to it in the meanwhile? What does it say that is practical, we mean?

THE LATE BARON ROTHSCHILD was the first Jew who occupied a seat in the House of Commons. He lived to behold a complete revolution in the relations between his race and the various European peoples. As a religious paper truly remarks, "Where a few years ago there were bitter enmity and scorn, there are toleration and kindness now." Biblicists may, if they will, ascribe this revolution to the Lord, and term it the fulfilment of prophecy; wiser persons, however, will be able to account for the change in the rapid decay of the hatred and intolerance it had so long encouraged and kept alive. The Jews themselves know well to whom they are indebted for their security.—National Reformer.

THE CORBIN CRUSADE.

WHAT SOME PROMINENT JEWS IN NEW YORK SAY OF IT.

The pronouncements of Mr. Corbin naturally created a great deal of excitement among the Jews of this city when it was made public yesterday, and indignation was freely expressed on all sides. The prominent men among the Jews, however, with few exceptions, showed a disinclination to talk much upon the subject, on the ground that they did not wish to give Mr. Corbin, or the road and hotel which he manages, too much notoriety. What the gentlemen visited by a Times reporter did say, however, although brief, was to the point. The action of Mr. Corbin was condemned in unmeasured terms by all, but all seemed to agree that there was nothing for the Jews to do but to treat the whole matter with silent contempt. To take any public notice of it as a people would, they claimed, raise it to a dignity to which it is not entitled, and the prevalent sentiment was that if Manhattan Beach can get along without the patronage of the Jews, the Jews certainly can get along without Manhattan Beach. The action of Mr. Corbin is looked upon as a deliberate insult to the Jewish race, given to induce the Jews to keep away from the beach. The law protects them in their rights to go and come wherever any other citizen may go and come, and so long as the Manhattan Railroad and the Manhattan Beach Hotel are open to the public, Mr. Corbin cannot force his unwelcome visitors away; and so, claim the Jews, he has taken this way to induce them to absent themselves voluntarily. From the tone used by the leading men of the Jewish race in this city, in commenting upon the facts yesterday, it is safe to infer that Manhattan Beach will not be troubled by any great number of Jewish visitors during the remainder of the present season.

Mr. Edward Lauterbach, the lawyer, is one of the most prominent of the Jewish residents of this city, and he wields a great influence among his fellow-citizens of the Hebrew faith. He was very much excited over the assault made by Mr. Corbin upon the Jews as a race, and spoke very freely his sentiments on the subject. He took a very prominent part in the Seligman-Hilton discussion two years ago, and probably understands the merits of the controversy, from a Jewish stand-point, as clearly as any gentleman in the city. He said to the reporter yesterday: "The illiberality which has apparently characterized the management of the Manhattan Beach Railroad and the Manhattan Beach Hotel has been of a nature to cause great surprise to the Jews of this city. The reported interview with the President of the Company this morning has completely astounded them. That some bigotry and intolerance still exist in this republican community, is not, perhaps, astonishing. So long as human nature remains as it is, there will be bigots in the world and men who are willing and anxious to become tyrants if they can. This is to be expected; but that the President of such a corporation as the Manhattan Beach Railway and Hotel Company should not only reveal himself as a narrow-minded bigot, but should also give expression to his feelings of intolerance in language so low and contemptible as that which he is reported to have used in speaking of the Jews, is, indeed, astonishing. The Hebrews are accustomed to hear themselves reviled, even in this nineteenth century, and in this land of civil and religious liberty; but the revilings come usually from the low and ignorant, and no attention is paid to them. This last insult to the Jewish race differs from that which was the subject of so much bitter discussion two summers ago, in that it is unqualifiedly an assertion against, and a proscription of, an entire people. It cannot be claimed as a mere matter of difference between two individuals, which was alleged to be the true gist of the controversy in the Seligman-Hilton affair. Nobody personally detestful to Mr. Corbin had applied to his hotel for board and been refused, but he makes a sweeping charge, utterly uncalled for, against an entire race, without warning, and, as we contend, without cause. I am utterly at a loss to conceive of any motive which could have actuated this malignant attack upon, and social ostracism of, a whole people. And it is the more unexpected at this time, because since the conduct of Judge Hilton at Saratoga was mooted and discussed it has met with universal execration and condemnation, both from the press and among our citizens generally. I had believed that no second Hilton could be found, until to-day, when I beheld a Corbin arise from his ashes. We are naturally surprised at the apparition, but I don't think any Jew is in the least frightened by it."

"What course do the Jews propose to take in the matter?" asked the reporter.

"Of course," answered Mr. Lauterbach, "the corporation represented by this man Corbin has no right to debar from the use of its railroad or of its hotel any race of people on account of their religion, or any individual so long as he conducts himself properly; and if the privileges of either were denied to any person upon the ground of race or religion, the officers of the company would be held to be criminally liable, and the company itself might be made to respond in heavy damages. I am inclined to believe that if either remedy were invoked it would effectually put an end to the public utterance of such sentiments as those expressed by Mr. Corbin, which no gentleman would be guilty of entertaining for an instant. The proper course for the Jews, as a body, to adopt is perfectly clear to my mind. They have been insulted in a most public and most aggravating manner, and the way to resent the insult is to treat the insulting party with the contempt which he justly merits. Unless this action of Corbin be disavowed by the Directors of the Manhattan Beach Company, and speedily disavowed, there is no Jew in this city who would so far demean himself as to patronize the company in any way whatever in the future. A race which has outlived so many prejudices as the Hebrew race has, can certainly afford to regard with contempt the expression of ignorant individual malice. The Jew has not only outlived, but he has lived down, by dint of ability, rectitude, honesty, and uprightness, the opposition begotten by religious intolerance; and the average member of that race, while entitled to no greater consideration than a member of any other race, may fairly lay claim to an equal degree of respect for his legal and social rights. As for Corbin," said Mr. Lauterbach, in conclusion, "his proper place is not in America. He should be relegated to Roumania, the savages of which country are the only people in the world who still maintain the hatred to race to which he has given such free vent. All civilized Europe to-day stands in an attitude of insisting that this barbarous people shall abandon the discrimination against the Jews which they have hitherto maintained; and I believe that every intelligent American, whether Jew or Gentile, will see to it that in this republican country, and in this century, the expression of Mr. Corbin's sentiment against the Jews will receive the detestation and execration that it deserves. It is not the duty of the Jews alone to resent this insult: it is the duty of every American citizen who believes in perpetuating the free institutions of his country."

Ex-Judge Abram J. Dittenhoefer deprecated the notoriety into which the Jews were again forced by the action of Mr. Corbin, and was of the opinion that the least said about the matter the better it would be for all concerned. As a business proposition, he believed that Mr. Corbin would find in the end that he had acted very foolishly in attempting to ostracize a whole people because, possibly, some few of the race had caused him a little annoyance. "I don't think," said the Judge, "that the Jews, either collectively or individually, should take any public action in the matter, or make much ado about it. It is a very stupid proceeding, that could only emanate from an ass, and the Jewish race must not raise it to the dignity of an insult to them. If anybody is insulted by Mr. Corbin, it is not the Jews. It is the non-Jewish portion of the American people,—excluding the descendants of the Spanish Inquisition,—and it is for them to denounce his imputation on their love of fair play and their Americanism. If they do not do this, American republicanism will soon become a by-word and a hissing among the nations of the earth. This was my view two years ago, when the judge-lawyer-trader, Henry Hilton, declared that he had not issued his edict of Nantes in a spirit of religious intolerance, but that it was 'a commercial purpose which actuated him.' Before publicity was given to that case, I advised Mr. Seligman's lawyers to lay the matter before Levi P. Morton, Jackson S. Schulz, and other prominent members of the Union League Club, of which Mr. Seligman is an honored member, for their condemnation and denunciation, and I felt assured that they would openly condemn and denounce it. I based this advice on the view which I held then and hold now, that it was they, and not the Jews, who were insulted; that it needed no public expression from the Jews to show that they were indignant, but that the case did require a prompt denunciation on the part of prominent non-Jewish citizens. Had this been done at that time, no Corbin would have arisen to duplicate the stupidity of Judge Hilton. The course which I then recommended I believe to be the proper one to be pursued in this case. The American people have been grossly insulted by Mr. Corbin, who tells them to their face that Manhattan Beach is a part of their country over which the principles of religion and social freedom are not to rule. Let the American people take up the gauntlet thus thrown down to them. The Jews have nothing to do with the matter, except to treat it with contempt, and to go to Manhattan Beach or stay away, precisely as their inclination prompts them."

Julius Bien, President of the Executive Committee of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, holds substantially the same views as Judge Dittenhoefer. He said: "The action of Mr. Corbin is much more of an insult to the Christians than to the Jews of the country, and I believe that most of my co-religionists will so regard it. With regard to his onslaught upon the Jews as a race, it was unwarranted and totally uncalled for. The Jews as a class are as well-behaved and modest a people as can be found anywhere on the face of the earth. I can't understand such statements as those made by Mr. Corbin in his attack this morning. If he has told what he believes to be the truth, his acquaintance with Jews and the Jewish character must be very limited indeed. The Jews, as a rule, instead of pushing themselves forward in any place, are prone to draw back and retire into themselves. Of course there are bad Jews as there are bad Irishmen and bad Americans. Every nationality is bound to have some black sheep in its flock. But the great majority of the Jews, especially of this country, are remarkably modest and inoffensive, and the proportion of the evil-minded among them is insignificant. I believe that the American people generally, too, recognize this fact. I have been in this country now for thirty years, and I never had an unpleasant word said to me on account of my religion. No insult was ever offered to an Israelite on account of his faith by any gentleman in this country. My religion is my own private affair. It is a matter between myself and my conscience. And, after all, what is the difference between a Christian and a Jew? It is a mere matter of form; the essence of our belief is the same. If Mr. Corbin cannot tolerate us on his care or in his hotel because we are Jews, the sensible course for us to pursue is to keep away from Manhattan Beach. Judge Hilton has already found out that he made a mistake at Saratoga, and Mr. Corbin will not be long in making the discovery that he, too, has committed an egregious blunder. As to agitating this question, or giving to it any more notoriety than can be helped, I am opposed to it. We had enough of that two years ago, and the only result was the creation of bitter feelings, which have not yet been fully eradicated. My advice to my co-religionists is to keep perfectly quiet on this subject and to let the excitement die out, and so far as I can I shall influence my people to do so. It is contrary to the spirit of the times to agitate a question of this kind in America, which we look upon as the home of religious liberty."

Jacob H. Schiff, of the firm of Kohn, Loeb & Co., bankers, condensed his comments into a very brief space. He said: "If, in the year 1879, persons can be found holding such views as Judge Hilton and Mr. Corbin have expressed, all that I have to say is that I pity them. Such views are not held by the intelligent part of the people. The subject is really not worth discussing. I pity the narrow-minded bigots, and that is all that I can say."—N. Y. Times.

THE FUTURE OF THE INDIANS.

Ranch men are many of them now willing to receive Indian boys as herders of cattle, under reasonable terms of apprenticeship. This mode of life would best suit the Indian, because it is not one of manual labor, and is nearest akin, of all civilized forms of industry, to the nomadic habits which are hereditary in them. The suggestion has also been made by a former manager of the American Fur Company, that the Indian youth be enrolled in our military forces on the plains, and into the navy on the lakes; and the plan is well worth a trial. The Pawnees, who have acted as auxiliary troops in the late years, have proven most useful and trustworthy. They are proud of their uniform and of their equipment, and have transferred their allegiance, and learned habits of respect and obedience for the officers of the government almost without knowing it.

Nearly all who have given much personal study to the Indian tribes are agreed that little can be done with the full-grown men but to feed them. The children alone are susceptible of education in any considerable degree. The most promising efforts made during the last twenty years are those which have looked to the industrial education of the Indian youth. Organized and persistent effort in that direction is demanded alike of the government and of the people. Whether we try to make of them soldiers, sailors, herdsmen, or farmers, it can only be done by revising our legislation so that it shall aim clearly and efficiently at the end proposed; and for this, first of all there must be the creation of such an intelligent public sentiment on the subject as shall command the attention and the action of Congress.

The question whether the control of Indian affairs shall remain in the Interior Department or be transferred to the army, is of little practical moment so long as our legislation is such that both military and civil officers are foredoomed to disappointment in any earnest efforts to solve the problem. When the exigencies of a political party may cut down the appropriations to a point where it is known that starvation at many Indian agencies must ensue; when carelessness and indifference postpone even the intended appropriations, till tribes that would be friendly are driven to outbreak by the hunger of their women and children, as Bishop Whipple tells us was the case in the last Sioux outbreak in Minnesota, and as has recently occurred again in the case of the Bannacks,—it is plain that the reform must begin in our legislative bodies, and they must learn to realize that life and death, peace and war, are at stake, when appropriation bills are delayed, before we can hope for much from the efforts even of the best-meaning officers on the frontier, whether they are soldiers or Quakers.—International.

GARRISON'S INFLUENCE.

Mr. Garrison's influence over others was most remarkable. After the war, George Thompson said of him, "Taking the hand of that young man in the streets of London thirty years ago changed the whole course of my life." John G. Whittier, in a letter to Mr. Garrison in 1863, said, "I cannot be sufficiently thankful to the Divine Providence, which, in a great measure through thy instrumentality, turned me so early away from what Roger Williams called 'the world's great trifling, pleasure, profit, and honor,' to take sides with the poor and oppressed."

The late Rev. Samuel J. May, of Syracuse, said, "The greatest event in my moral and spiritual life occurred on the evening when I first heard our friend Mr. Garrison. I was so impressed by his words that a resolution was formed in my soul from that moment to dedicate myself to the cause of the slave."

Wendell Phillips once said of Mr. Garrison, "Whatever may have been the immediate cause of my anti-slavery life and action, he is in so true and full a sense the creator of the anti-slavery movement, that I have never uttered anti-slavery words which I did not owe to his inspiration."

Other distinguished men have expressed themselves in a similar manner. The lamented Dr. Folson was his early friend and coadjutor.

When Charles Sumner returned to his constituents, half-murdered, he was received with the highest honors by as vast a multitude as could find standing-room along the route from Roxbury line to the State House. On that occasion he was enjoined by his physician to make no exertions whatever, and above all things to keep his head covered. In the doorway of a corner house of a well-known abolitionist stood Mr. Garrison on the top step. Mr. Sumner saw him, and for the only time on the whole route removed his hat. The crowd cheered the act, and turning to Mr. Garrison cheered him long and loudly.

The Rev. Samuel Johnson, who took part in the services at Mr. Garrison's funeral, supplied the pulpit of the Third Unitarian Society at Harrison Square Church in 1864. It was a year of great anti-slavery excitement. Among other events of that year was the rendition of Anthony Burns. Some of us can remember Mr. Johnson's remarkable sermon preached in that church in favor of the higher law as against the fugitive slave. He was the minister who, when he was told by a wealthy and influential member of that parish what would probably be the effect of his radical preaching, replied by saying that "he did not understand his mission to Dorchester was to raise the price of real estate."—H. W. B., in Woman's Journal.

THE BIBLE IN SCHOOL.

The people of school district No. 6, Yonkers, in this State, last week held an excited election over the vexed question of the public schools. The point to be decided was whether the parish school of St. Joseph's Catholic Church, on Oak Hill Avenue, should be taken under the care of the Board of Education, somewhat after the "Poughkeepsie plan," the building being leased to the board for a nominal rent, with the proviso that it might be used at other than school hours for Catholic instruction. The Catholics of the district had become tired of supporting this parish school and at the same time paying taxes for the public school, and were quite willing to enter into such an arrangement. The result of the election was a defeat of the plan, by a vote of 430 to 337. We are glad the plan was defeated, for we do not believe in solving the school problem in this way. Justice, however, to the Catholics requires that those who have defeated this plan should not insist upon having any religious exercises in the public school offensive to Catholics. King James' Bible in such a school is no more admissible than the Douay Bible. The objection of the Catholics to the former is just as good as that of the Protestants to the latter. Catholics have rights in the public school as well as Protestants. While we would not concede an inch of ground to any Catholic use of our public-school system, we would for the same reason not concede an inch to any Protestant use of the system. There is, so far as the principle is concerned, absolutely no difference between these uses, and neither is right.—Independent, June 19.

SURVIVAL OF SUPERSTITIOUS BELIEFS.

Here are a few illustrations of the persistence of superstitious beliefs. They are taken from a paper in All the Year Round, entitled "Some Popular Cures." Many, if not all, of these beliefs doubtless survive, even on this side of the Atlantic. A cure for whooping-cough, in use not only in England but in North Germany, consists in putting into the mouth of the whooping child a newly-caught fish, and then letting it go again. The cough is communicated to the fish. Another cure for the same malady consists in passing the child nine times under and over a donkey. To charm away warts, an elder-shoot is to be rubbed over them; then as many notches are cut on the twig as there are warts. The twig is buried, and as it rots away the warts disappear. There are persons still living who have been stroked by a hanged man's hand for the sake of dispelling tumors. In Devonshire there is a superstition that, if a person suffering from any disease throw a handkerchief in the coffin of a suicide, the disease will be cured as the handkerchief rots away. In other localities, the fore-foot of a hare, worn constantly in the pocket, is considered a potent charm against rheumatism. A like practice is found in this country, a horse-chestnut taking the place of the hare's foot. In some places the anti-rheumatic talisman is a potato. Bread baked on "Good Friday" is supposed to possess wonderful curative virtues. Such bread, it seems, never grows mouldy. It is often kept for years, sometimes as many as twenty. It is most effectual when taken grated in brandy. Nor is it only for man's ailments that Good Friday bread is medicine; it is also considered good for some of the complaints of animals; for instance, it cures "the scours" in calves.—Popular Science Monthly.

FOREIGN.

THE ANNIVERSARY of the storming of the Bastille was celebrated in Paris, June 14.

AN EQUESTRIAN statue of the Prince of Wales, presented to the city of Bombay by Sir Albert Sissons, was unveiled June 28th. The Governor of Bombay and its principal residents, both European and native, honored the occasion by their presence.

THE BILL FOR THE prohibition of vivisection was rejected on the 13th ult. in the House of Lords, England. The Bishop of Peterborough said that "unnecessary pain to any animal he joined in condemning, but, if it were lawful to put animals to the pain of death for the purpose of preserving human life by animal food, was it possible to contend that it was unlawful to put them to pain for the preservation of human life by the cure of disease?"

PRINCE CHARLES of Roumania is reported to have threatened to abdicate unless the Jews are emancipated. It is believed, however, that the question will be settled by M. Bratianu, President of the Council, forming a coalition cabinet which will arrange some compromise of the Jewish question that will be acceptable to the powers. A Berlin despatch to the Pall Mall Gazette says that Germany has declined to entertain proposals from Roumania for the modification of the provisions of the treaty of Berlin relative to the emancipation of the Jews.

A FOUR NIGHTS' DEBATE, says the National Reformer, has just taken place in the Queen's Theatre, Dunedin, Eng., on the Divine Origin of Christianity, the disputants accepting the following definition of terms: 1. By "divine origin," it is understood to be of divine origin in the sense in which no other religion is; 2. In the term "Christianity," it is understood that there are included the deity of Jesus, and his death as an atonement for man's sin. The affirmative was maintained by W. Green, described as a minister of the Church of Christ, Dunedin, and the negative was taken by Charles Bright, free-thought lecturer, who is a liberal Spiritualist.

WHILE BISHOP ELLICOTT votes in favor of war against savages, on the ground that it will help forward the spread of the gospel, Bishop Colenso raises his voice against so debasing a teaching, and declares that a nation's prestige depends, not on military success and victorious violence, but on justice, fair dealing, and humanity. It was Bishop Colenso who offered to go alone to the sad field of lawandama, and read the English burial service over the corpses of our soldiers, left during four long months for the crows and the jackals to devour, while Lord Chelmsford idled in safety in Natal. It is now Bishop Colenso who offers to go alone—unprotected save by his own pure fame—to Cetywayo himself, and to persuade him to accept terms of peace, which would be also acceptable to the English authorities. It is instructive to remember that this one man, out of all the bishops of the English Church, has been prosecuted for heresy, and has been condemned by the Church both in Natal and in England. The heretic bishop is the only one of his order who has pleaded for morality in our dealings with the weak.—Annie Besant, in National Reformer.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Secular Review, who has spent two years in this country, thinks that radicals in England are disposed to over-estimate the strength of freethought in the United States. He says: "It is true that the Liberal League have extended their ramifications and enrolled a considerable number of members; but still it is acknowledged that freethought makes comparatively slow progress on the other side, and Americans are prone to think that there is more vitality in the movement here. They attribute their national supineness on the subject to the fact that they have no established or State-controlled church to awaken the popular opposition. Then, again, it must be remembered that the population there is constantly being recruited from the ignorant and superstitious portions of Europe. Away with the delusion which prevails here respecting America; there is in fact more bigotry, intolerance, and superstition in that country than in Old England. We have among us more lecturers and earnest workers in the freethought cause than they have, and a better element to work upon here. I agree that there is too much isolation with us, and that we stand in need of better organization, more especially for the purpose of starting fresh lecturers into the field, for whom there is ample scope."

JESTINGS.

THE NORRISTOWN Herald says that a beautiful custom prevails in many parts of Europe of planting a tree upon the birth of every child. It saves wear and tear of slippers.

AN IRISH SHOEMAKER lately advised a customer, when he complained of his new boots being tight, not to put them on until he had worn them for a day or two.—Cambridge Tribune.

"ARE YOU LOST, my little fellow?" asked a gentleman of a four-year-old boy who was crying in the street for his mother. "No, I ain't lost, but my mother is," he sobbed.—Ottawa Herald.

A MAN'S CURIOSITY never reaches the female standard until some one tells him his name was in yesterday's paper. Then he'd walk five miles and pay a dollar, if he had it, to get that paper.

THE FATHER of a St. Louis bride presented his son-in-law with eighty thousand head of cattle. "Papa dear," exclaimed his daughter when she heard of it, "that was so kind of you; Charley's awfully fond of ox-tail soup."

AN OLD Scotch lady gave a pointed reply to a minister who knew he had offended her, and expressed surprise that she should come so regularly to hear him preach. Said she: "My quarrel's wi' yon, man: it's no wi' the gospel."

A WORD TO THE WISE is sufficient. A minister made an interminable call upon a lady of his acquaintance. Her little daughter who was present grew weary of his conversation, and whispered in an audible tone, "Didn't he bring his amen with him, mamma?"

THE FOLLOWING testimonial of a certain patent medicine speaks for itself: "Dear Sir,—Two months ago my wife could scarcely speak. She has taken two bottles of your 'Life Renewer,' and now she can't speak at all. Please send me two more bottles. I wouldn't be without it."

THE LATE Cardinal de Morichini, Bishop of Albano, was a very learned and amiable man who was possessed of a fund of quiet humor. One day a discussion was going on in his presence concerning a certain Italian orator and statesman noted for verbosity. "Yes," said Cardinal Morichini, "he is an admirable speaker: he doesn't know what he is saying, but he says it so well."—Jewish Times.

MEETING IT HONESTLY.—In these days, when the temperance question absorbs so much of public attention, it may not be out of place to quote the saying of an eccentric English gentleman, a candidate for Parliament, at a recent meeting of his constituents. A man in the crowd called out: "What about the liquor bill?" "Well," said the candidate, "mine was uncommonly high last year. How was yours?"—N. Y. Tribune.

Advertisements.

THE PATRONAGE

of the liberal advertising public is respectfully solicited for THE INDEX. The attempt will be honestly made to keep the advertising pages of THE INDEX in entire harmony with its general character and principles, and thus to furnish to the public an advertising medium which shall be not only profitable to its patrons, but also worthy of their most generous support. To this end, all improper or "blind" advertisements, all quack advertisements, and all advertisements believed to be fraudulent or unjust to any one, will be excluded from these columns.

THE INDEX must not be held responsible for any statement made by advertisers, who will in all cases accept the responsibility for their own statements.

ADVERTISING RATES.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 26, 1872.
 To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:

Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY B. STEINBERG.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. OHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, Tenny, N.Y.
 J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
 ELIZUR WRIGHT, Boston.
 C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
 W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
 BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.
 ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.
 JAMES E. OLIVER, Ithaca, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large," and later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $3.20 for one year, including postage, or 10 cents for three months on trial.

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for greed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

SIFTINGS.

A ROMAN CATHOLIC church was recently dedicated at Plymouth, Mass.

SIR BARTLE FREER claims the Zulu war is waged in the interest of Christianity.

THE KING OF Southern Abyssinia deserves a word of praise. He has abolished the slave trade in his dominions.

WHATEVER you would not wish your neighbor to do to you, do it not unto him. This is the whole law: the rest is a mere exposition of it.—Talmud.

PETITIONS in support of the bill for closing public houses in England and Wales on Sundays have been extensively circulated and signed in those countries.

IT ALWAYS seemed to us that Josh Billings was not duly appreciated. It appears now that he has been a pioneer reformer,—spelling reformer we mean. Who knows but that, when we have all adopted his orthography, his statue will take its place in our public parks with other pioneers?

AT THE LATE regatta at Lake George, a Methodist preacher, in a canoe of his own build, beat all competitors. The early apostles were given a good deal to boasting, we are told. This modern apostle appears to bear a closer resemblance to the primitive ones than many who claim to be in the line of Apostolic succession.

THE CHINESE are, as everybody knows, remarkably imitative. Wong Wing, one of the pillars of a Chinese Methodist church in California, has absconded with $500 of the funds. It is evident that Wong Wing had too much pride of race to allow himself to be outdone by "Melican" Christian "pillars" in this kind of distinction.

IT IS SAID THERE is always a great rush to Niagara after some one has gone over the falls. Might it not be well for the proprietors to enter into arrangements with those who are on the point of committing suicide, for the purpose of supplying such attraction? It would certainly be an original mode of advertising. It is true, it might seem like overdoing the business.

A METHODIST paper gives a list of thirty-three cases in which ministers of the Northern Methodist Church, going South to preach to the negroes, have either been killed or maltreated since the war. Some of the cases bear a date subsequent to the solemn adoption of fraternity between the Northern and Southern Methodist churches.

"FATHER PRESOTT," an Episcopalian preacher of Philadelphia, inclines to Romanish practices. At present he is in Europe. But before he left he was notified by Bishop Stevens of the charges against him, and that he is expected to appear before a committee of the diocese to answer them next October. It is thought the affair may afford an ecclesiastical sensation for Philadelphia in the autumn.

IT IS BELIEVED by Roman Catholics that saints preserve from calamity. But we read that during a pilgrimage to the shrine of one in Poland this summer, fifteen of the devotees were killed by lightning. It was a shameful breach of faith on the part of the saint toward the pilgrims, and we should not have blamed them if they had turned their back on such saintship and had nothing more to do with it.

"THE BURIAL SERVICE of our church," wrote the bishop of London to an English rector a short time since, "cannot legally be read over any person who has not been baptized. The law upon this point is perfectly clear, and you would have been guilty of an ecclesiastical offence, had you read the service over the person to whom your note refers, knowing as you did, upon her father's testimony, that she died without having received holy baptism."

IT IS RECORDED that the old monks said of the printing-press, "We must put it down or it will us." This is still the Roman Catholic policy with respect to all agencies of popular enlightenment. Wherever this church prevails, the power of the press dwindles in a correspondent ratio into insignificance. Here is testimony to the point: The daily circulation of the most popular newspaper in the Roman Catholic city of Mexico, with a population of two hundred thousand, does not exceed two thousand copies.

THOSE WHO REVERE the memory of Wm. Lloyd Garrison, and especially those who were not present at his funeral, will be interested to learn that a full report of the services of the occasion, including the addresses delivered, has been issued in neat form for preservation. It contains an excellent likeness of Mr. Garrison from the bust of Miss Anne Whitney, and is supplemented with the tribute of Mr. Phillips to Mrs. Garrison, from a memorial volume prepared by Mr. Garrison after her decease. Messrs. Houghton & Osgood are the publishers. The price in paper covers, is fifty cents; in cloth, seventy-five cents. Copies may be obtained at this office.

THE TOWN of Monroe never had a religious society organized within its limits, and has no place of public worship. It never had a hotel, and no lawyer or doctor ever had the courage to settle there. Three Universalist ministers have been born in the town. The voting list comprises forty-nine names, and the total population is less than two hundred. And yet they live. But then, what a spiritless existence they must have led! How many church quarrels they have missed, and various religious sensations. If they had only had a minister, they would have been sure to have had a lawyer, and then, as usual, social agitation and all its little stirring animosities, to make them like other people.

WE TRANSLATE this from the Milwaukee Freidenker: In Neumark, West Prussia, the wife of a laborer named Z— fell sick. Instead of consulting the doctor, the anxious husband hastened to a wise woman: with horror he learned from her that his wife must be bewitched. If he could succeed in drawing blood from the witch, his wife would be cured! Returning home, the pair concluded that the witch could be none other than a former neighbor, a Mrs. M—. Enticing her to the house, on pretext of giving her a can of milk, Z— closed the door, and choked the unsuspecting woman until she was nearly breathless, while his wife elaborated the head of the victim with great sticks of wood until the blood flowed. The matter will come to the courts.

SO MANY YEARS have elapsed since the death of Horace Mann, that Antioch College, Ohio, to which he dedicated the closing years of his life, and of which he was the first president, has been, to some extent, forgotten. Like all new institutions of the kind, remotely situated, as it has been, from the sections of the country where the influence and patronage of the denomination under whose auspices it was projected are strongest, or with just enough of such to operate nearly as much as an impediment as an assistance, it has of course had its share of up-hill experience. We are pleased to learn, however, that it has bravely weathered these adversities, and has been steadily growing in efficiency and genuine prosperity. Its natural environments are said to be very attractive. It is provided with adequate and appropriate buildings, and all the facilities of a first-class institution. Its professors are persons of high culture and ability in their specific departments, and the instruction includes preparatory and collegiate courses for both sexes. In respect to religion, the college aims to be broad and independent. Its emphasis is upon culture and character, rather than specific religious affirmations. From what we learn of Antioch College, we feel much confidence in commending it to liberals in the West. It is our impression they will find less that is objectionable in its conduct and spirit for the education of their sons and daughters, than in any college of that part of the country. ## RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

Will the Coming Man Worship God?

A LECTURE DELIVERED AT WHITE HALL, ILL.,
 JUNE 29, 1879.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

That religions, considered as systems of doctrine, have been developed from simple conditions, many theologians are willing to concede; but they all continue to maintain that religion, considered as an element of the human mind or a predisposition to worship, is a primordial part of man's nature, with which he must have been endowed when he came from the hand of his Maker. And as certainly as thirst implies water and hunger food, as certainly as fear implies something to dread and affection beings to love, the religious element of man's nature, it is affirmed, presupposes a personal intelligent Being whom it is our duty to reverence and adore.

But if the theory of evolution be true, religion, regarded as an element of human nature, as far as it is such, as well as a body of doctrine, has come into existence naturally with the development of the race. If man has a relationship with the animals below him, and has risen from the condition of creatures incapable of religious ideas and devoid of a religious nature, then his tendency to worship, not less than his belief in regard to the power that he worships, must have been acquired; in which case it presupposes those causes only which have combined to produce this tendency.

The evidence seems to be abundant that there are tribes on the earth to-day entirely destitute of religion; or, if they have it at all, it is in such a rudimentary condition that travellers are unable to observe any indications of it. Of a tribe of Bechuanas, Moffat, who was among them many years, says: "The people have many ceremonies and superstitions, believe in the influence of witchcraft and charms; but no one of them has the remotest reference to religion. They have no knowledge whatever of idols or anything intended to represent an invisible power, and consequently have nothing of a religious character." (En. Brit. ar. Bechuanas.)

"There is," says Darwin, "ample evidence derived, not from hasty travellers, but from men who have long resided with savages, that numerous races have existed, and still exist, who have no idea of one or more gods, and who have no words in their languages to express such an idea." (Des. of Man, Vol. I., p. 63.)

Lubbock, in his Origin of Civilization and Prehistoric Times, quotes the testimonies of many travellers and explorers to show that there are numerous tribes without religion, and remarks himself that "sailors, traders, and philosophers, Roman Catholic priests and Protestant missionaries, in ancient and in modern times, in every part of the globe, have concurred in stating that there are races of men altogether devoid of religion. . . . The question as to the general existence of religion among men is indeed to a great extent a matter of definition. If the mere sensation of fear and the recognition that there are probably other beings more powerful than man are sufficient alone to constitute a religion, then we must, I think, admit that religion is general to the human race. But when a child dreads the darkness and shrinks from a lightless room, we never regard that as evidence of religion. Moreover, if these definitions be adopted, we cannot longer regard religion as peculiar to man. We must admit that the feeling of a dog or a horse towards its master is of the same character, and the baying of a dog to the moon is as much an act of worship as some ceremonies which have been so described by travellers." (Origin of Civilization, p. 121.)

The statement of Lubbock, that there are tribes devoid of religion unless indeed we no longer regard religion as peculiar to man, is significant. It indicates that there is no sharp dividing line between religious and unreligious creatures, and of itself is sufficient to suggest that as the higher religions have been evolved from the lower ones, so the lowest religions have grown out of conditions with which we are accustomed to associate nothing of a religious character. Certain it is, there are tribes in which the intellectual faculties are so feeble that the phenomena of Nature have as yet scarcely become an object of thought. According to the theory of evolution, all the higher races of men have come up through stages in which the lowest on earth yet remain. Who can doubt that the men who lived in the earlier ages of human existence were as destitute of religion as are the Bechuanas or Arafuras of to-day? Of the intellectual condition of man in a very remote past, we know something from the rough implements of stone which have outlasted the bones of the rude men who made them.

"Religiously," says Winchell, "there is little to be affirmed or inferred of the Palaeolithic tribes. Some curiously wrought flints may have served as religious emblems; and the discovery of deposits of food near the body of the dead may very naturally be regarded as evidence of a belief in future life." (Adamites and Preadamites, p. 36.)

But there was a yet more remote and a more rude stone age. And there must have been yet earlier ages in which man lived, and was able to leave no memorial of his existence, and during which, in a religious point of view, he was still more like the brute mentally than at the time he is first brought to our notice by prehistoric archaeology. Occupied for ages in contests with wild beasts and obtaining food, his life was of a kind not adapted to favor the contemplation of natural phenomena, and when, after ages of mental development, under exceptionally favorable circumstances, he began to form ideas and to frame hypotheses, they must have been very simple, crude, and indistinct.

How natural that he should invest inanimate objects with his own thoughts and feelings! Here is indicated an intellectual condition hardly above that of the brutes. "My dog," says Darwin, "a full-grown and very sensible animal, was lying on the lawn during a hot and still day; but at a little distance a slight breeze occasionally moved an open parasol, which would have been wholly disregarded by the dog had any one stood near it. As it was, every time that the parasol slightly moved the dog growled fiercely and barked. He must, I think, have reasoned to himself, in a rapid and unconscious manner, that movement without any apparent cause indicated the presence of some strange living agent, and no stranger had a right to be on his territory." (Des. of Man, Vol. I., p. 65.) "An authentic case is on record of a sky-terrier," says Fiske, "being accustomed to obtain favors from his master by sitting on his haunches, will also sit before his pet India-rubber ball placed on the chimney-piece, evidently beseeching it to jump down and play with him. Such a fact as this is quite in harmony with Auguste Comte's suggestion that such intelligent animals as dogs, apes, and elephants may be capable of forming a few fetichistic notions. The behavior of the terrier here rests upon the assumption that the ball is open to the same sort of entreaty which prevails with the master; which implies, not that the wistful brute accredits the ball with a soul, but that in his mind the distinction between life and inanimate existence has never been thoroughly established. Just this confusion between things living and things not living is present throughout the whole philosophy of fetichism, and the confusion between things seen and things dreamed, which suggests the notion of another self, belongs to this same twilight stage of intelligence, in which primal man has not yet clearly demonstrated his immeasurable superiority to the brutes." (Myth and Myth-Makers, p. 221-2.)

With these facts in mind, it is evident, as McLennan remarks, that "the simplest hypothesis, and the first to occur to men, seems to have been that natural phenomena are ascribable to the presence in animals, plants, and things, and in the forces of Nature, of such spirits prompting to action as men are conscious they themselves possess." (Fort. Review, 1869, p. 422.)

"Man," says Goethe, "is a true Narcissus; he delights to see his own image everywhere; and he spreads himself underneath the universe like the amalgam behind the glass." Thus man, projecting his own nature unconsciously out upon the field of natural phenomena, investing the objects around him with his own thoughts and feelings, commences worship by contemplating himself. To early man, pieces of wood and stone were intelligent objects, and he sought to win their favor and secure their aid. Later he invests with his own nature the mountains, rivers, and clouds, the sun, moon, and stars; and when the power of abstraction increases with the development of reason and imagination, he forms conceptions of beings, more or less like himself, but invisible to the eye, and incognizable to all the senses. "We still say," says Mill, "the sun rises and sets and comes to the meridian, the sea ebbs and flows. Languages were formed by men who believed these objects to have life and active power in themselves." (Logic, Vol. I., p. 364.)

"Man paints himself in his gods," says Schiller; and the character of his gods is determined by his own, for the reason that he worships, unconsciously to himself, his own qualities abstracted from himself, and viewed objectively, whether in the piece of wood, the passing clouds, the flowing stream, the quiet stars, the changing moon, or the glorious sun; whether in a personal being sitting on a throne with a crown on his head and a sceptre in his hand, or in a power that—

"Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze, Glow in the stars and blossoms in the trees."

With malice and revenge in his own heart, he cannot help believing he is surrounded by beings who delight in making him suffer, and to whom he therefore prays in fear and trembling. Nature in her pleasant moods excites opposite feelings. The genial sunshine, abundant game, health, success in combat, whatever gratifies him, he ascribes to beings who possess the good qualities of which he is conscious in himself; and to them he prays in reverent recognition of their superior power, in grateful acknowledgment of his own dependence, and with an eager desire to secure a continuance of these blessings. Religion then, considered as a belief or hypothesis and as a practice of devotional rites and ceremonies, is seen to have a natural basis, and to be due to natural causes. It depends upon two factors: qualities of the human mind, fear, selfishness, gratitude, wonder, admiration, etc., and the external world whose phenomena are ever present to the mind of man.

But here it will be asked: How came man to have a religious nature, a tendency to worship which in the individual is antecedent to experience, which now depends not upon any observation of Nature, which depends not upon experiences such as those through which our savage ancestors passed. The answer, in the light of modern psychology, is not difficult to give, at least in a general way. In the course of ages, states of mind produced by the outward world have become organized in the race in the form of tendencies. A father who has acquired the habit of drunkenness may transmit to his offspring the result of his experience in the form of an appetite for stimulants. There are islands having species of animals and birds possessing an instinctive fear of man, but which exhibited no fear of him when man first visited those islands. Man by his destructive agency has produced in these animals sensations which by repetition, and by the transmission of the results on the brain and nervous system through successive generations, have become condensed and fixed in the species as an instinct which, whenever man, who first produced the impression, appears, manifests itself in a very positive manner. So the shepherd dog and sporting dogs have characteristics which, although originally acquired, are now innate or instinctive. Thus that which is learned, whether from a personal teacher or by contact with Nature, and is repeated through centuries, may produce states of mind which by heredity appear in the descendants in the form of aptitudes or predispositions. "Instinct is inherited habit," or, more properly, instincts are states of mind produced by habits, and by repetition and transmission organized in the race. Although innate in the individual, they are due to ancestral experiences. We are all full of these tendencies, some good, others bad. We have to some extent aptitude for music, mechanics, poetry, oratory, philosophy, language. We have tendencies to temperance or intemperance, to chastity or licentiousness, to truthfulness or falsehood, to courage or cowardice. These tendencies of mind, as well as bodily characteristics, come to us as a legacy from former generations, and, although independent of our individual experience, have been acquired by our ancestors. We are not born with innate ideas, but it is unquestionable that we come into the world with organisms whose actions and reactions are largely determined by the form and quality of structures, and they include all those results of generations which appear in us as aptitudes and intuitions.

I believe, then, that our religious nature, as far as we possess such a nature, is due ultimately to the experiences of our ancestors. The contemplation of Nature and the disposition to worship induced by ages of experience, during which fear, admiration, wonder, gratitude, and reverence have been constantly excited, have resulted in a predisposition to worship, which, although due to experience in the race, is now a priori in the individual wherever it is found. Thus much as to the natural genesis of religion considered as a part of man's nature.

Outside of the human mind, it presupposes, not a personal being who implanted it in man, and the worship of whom is man's highest and noblest duty, but that world of phenomena, with all its wealth and variety, with all its beauty and deformity, which confronted our earliest ancestors as it confronts us today. The instinctive fear of man exhibited by wild animals implies the existence of man and those destructive acts which excited their dread and terror. And if the religious tendencies of man have been acquired in the manner indicated, they presuppose, in addition to the susceptible mind, not a supernatural Being who endowed man with a religious nature when he appeared on the earth, but the material world that impressed him and produced those mental states, which have been repeated and the results transmitted in the form of a predisposition to worship. There is nothing in the religious instinct that determines the particular form or character of the object of worship. That depends upon the intellectual and moral condition of the worshipper, due chiefly to the instruction he has personally received from parents and teachers.

But in every stage of religious thought, as we have seen, from the lowest fetishism to the loftiest monotheism, the real object of man's fear, reverence, or devotion is the qualities of the human mind with which he invests the external world. Man cannot rise above or get beyond his own nature. Of beings having characteristics essentially different from his own, he cannot possibly conceive. He may imagine on some distant star beings higher than himself, or different in their external appearances; yet the positive and final predicates which he gives to these beings are necessarily drawn from his own nature. An analysis of all such conceptions will show that although we can extend our thoughts quantitatively, yet the quality of our thoughts is determined by our nature and surroundings. We can have ideals superior to ourselves as individuals, but no ideals the elements of which do not exist in the species to which we belong.

Keeping in view this obvious principle, a rigid analysis of religion will enable us to see that, as a system of thought in which phenomena are ascribed to a being or to beings who are believed to be proper objects of worship, it is an indirect form of self-knowledge. As Feuerbach has shown with much fulness and variety of illustration, man unconsciously studies his own nature in the contemplation of gods, long before his intellectual and moral nature becomes a direct object of study.

In every age, man discovers and recognizes that what was in a preceding age regarded as the true god was the subjective nature of man viewed objectively. When a nation or a race has outgrown a religion, the old god comes to be regarded only as a conceptual being corresponding with the mental condition of the times in which it prevailed. The picture taken in childhood cannot be looked upon as a correct likeness of the same individual grown to manhood. No more can man be pleased with the mental image of himself that was formed during his intellectual childhood. As between the likeness of the youth and that of the man, there is more or less resemblance, so between the gods of two periods, separated by ages and widely different in their intellectual condition, there will be much in common.

The profoundly religious man of to-day never recognizes the identity between himself and the object of his worship; but he sees the applicability of this principle in times and among peoples having conceptions of God that are gross and low. The enlightened Christian readily admits this to be true of the ignorant savage. The well-informed Christian and the enlightened Hebrew of to-day admit that many of the Old Testament representations of Deity are very imperfect, and they apologize for their grossness by saying that God in those days accommodated himself to the rude, ignorant condition of the people, since they were unable to entertain any conceptions of God unless they were of a being like themselves. But it is just as certain that the conception of God by the theologian of to-day is a conception of the nature of man; and whenever the theist has recourse to volition to supply the nexus between cause and effect, he unconsciously invests Nature with his own human personality.

Since worship had its origin in man's contemplation of his own nature, in observing himself reflected from the mirror of his own thoughts, in fearing and reverencing his own qualities seen illusively in the objective world, the conclusion seems unavoidable that the continuance of worship must depend upon the continued recognition of a personality like himself behind or immanent in the world of phenomena. To say that God exists, that it is our duty to worship him, that worship consists in contemplating his majesty, his goodness, his love, in adoring and praising him for what he is as well as for what he does, and then to say that all our conceptions of him are but illusions, that all our thoughts of him, on which our admiration and love are founded, are no representation of him at all, that he is an unknown and unknowable something entirely beyond our comprehension,—these two statements taken together are, it seems to me, quite inconsistent and absurd. On hearing them the first time, a mind unperturbed by theological teachings would, I think, wonder whether God, if anything, were not really a demon amusing himself by making man a victim of illusion, deception, and fraud.

A god has no significance or value for an ardent worshipper unless he can contemplate him as a being like himself, who approves and disapproves human actions, who sees man's movements, who hears his words, who sympathizes with him in misfortune and distress, to whom he can appeal when in need of aid, and from whom blessings come in response to prayer. What cares the devotee for the "absolute," the "unconditioned," the "unknowable,"—a god without any of those human qualities with the contemplation of which in fear, in reverence, in love, worship commenced and worship has been sustained through all the ages of man's existence as a religious being.

Just in proportion as men cease to regard God as a being possessing qualities like themselves, will they cease to worship and to find that consolation in communion with God that is the joy and the boast of the devotee. How can he find satisfaction in communing with something of which he can have no conception, and between which and himself there may be nothing in common?

"I am," says Henry James, "constrained by every inspiration of true manhood to demand for my worship a perfectly human deity, who is so intent upon rescuing every creature he has made from the everlasting death and damnation he bears about in himself, as finitely constituted, as not to shrink, if need be, from humbling himself to every patient form of ignominy, and feeding contentedly year in and year out, century after century, and millennium after millennium, upon the literal breath of man." (Substance and Shadow, p. 495.)

That is the kind of God that the worshipper demands and which alone can satisfy the strong religious nature. But that is the kind of God of which there is no proof, of which there is proof to the contrary, and belief in which is fast fading out of intellectual minds. And the man who has outgrown belief in a personal, intelligent, anthropomorphic Being, a being possessing a nature like his own, has outgrown the desire and need of worship, except so far as the lingering tendencies produced by ages of religious devotion in his ancestors assert themselves when the beliefs that caused them have been cast aside.

Since worship began with the conception of personality and intelligence outside of man that could be placated and pleased, when the belief in such personality and intelligence disappears worship must also cease. No doubt, as Mr. John Fiske maintains, the purification and refinement of theism consists in a continuous process of "deanthropomorphization," discarding the human qualities with which man has invested Deity. But as theism commenced by ascribing natural phenomena to personality and intelligence, and has always recognized them as the essential attributes of Deity, when they are discarded, when it is affirmed that we cannot philosophically believe in a personal intelligent being as the cause of phenomena, the essential element of theism is abandoned, and worship is no longer possible. When Mr. Fiske purifies and refines theism by the total abolition of every anthropomorphic element, he simply purifies and refines God out of existence, at least deprives him of every quality that has had or can have any interest for the worshipper. In affirming the existence of Absolute Reality, self-existent and eternal, and "of which all phenomena, as presented in consciousness, are manifestations, but which we can only know through these manifestations," the "Cosmic Theist," as Mr. Fiske calls himself, postulates that only which is common to theism and atheism, and which is more appropriately represented by the algebraic X than by the word God.

Since the God of the worshipper must have qualities, and psychical qualities such as man is conscious of possessing, Mr. Fiske's Cosmic Theism can afford no consolation to the religious worshipper. Imagine the devotee attempting to reconcile the duty and delight of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving with sentences like these:—

"For to represent the Deity as a person who thinks, contrives, and legislates, is simply to represent him as a product of evolution. The definition of intelligence being 'the continuous adjustment of specialized inner relations to specialized outer relations,' it follows that to represent the Deity as intelligent, is to surround Deity with an environment, and thus to destroy its infinity and its self-existence." (Cosmic Philosophy, Vol. II., p. 394-5.)

"In ascribing intelligence to unembodied spirit, we are either using meaningless jargon, or we are implicitly surrounding unembodied spirit with an environment of some kind, and are thus declaring it to be both limited and dependent." (Ibid., p. 396.)

"It is not that the environment has been adapted to the organism by an exercise of creative intelligence and beneficence, but it is that the organism is necessarily fitted to the environment because the fittest survive." (p. 398.)

"It is not the intelligence which has made the environment, but it is the environment which has moulded the intelligence." (p. 402.)

"If there exist a personal Creator of the universe who is infinitely intelligent and powerful, he cannot be infinitely good; and if, on the other hand, he be infinite in goodness, then he must be lamentably finite in power or in intelligence." (p. 405.)

"With Mr. Mill, therefore, 'I will call no being good who is not what I mean when I apply that epithet to my fellow-creatures.' And, going a step further, I will add that it is impossible to call that being good, who, existing prior to the phenomenal universe, and creating it out of the plenitude of infinite power and foreknowledge, endowed it with such properties that its material and moral development must inevitably be attended by the misery of untold millions of sentient creatures for whose existence their Creator is ultimately responsible. In short, there can be no hypothesis of a moral government of the world which does not implicitly assert an immoral government. As soon as we seek to go beyond the process of evolution disclosed by science, and posit an external agency which is in the slightest degree anthropomorphic, we are obliged either to supplement and limit this agency by a second one that is diabolic, or else to include elements of diabolism in the character of the first Agency itself." (p. 408.)

"Personality and infinity are terms expressive of ideas which are mutually incompatible. The pseud-idea 'Infinite Person' is neither more nor less unthinkable than the pseud-idea 'circular triangle.' As Spinoza somewhere says, Determinatio negatio est, to define God is to deny him; and such being the case, what can be more irrational than to insist upon thought and volition, phenomena only known to exist within quite narrow limitations, as the very nature and essence of the Infinite Deity." (p. 408-9.)

How evident that Mr. Fiske's "Divine Power," as he occasionally ventures to characterize the "unknowable," without goodness, without personality, without intelligence, can never be an object of interest to the religious worshipper! Anticipating the obvious criticisms, Mr. Fiske says that "it will doubtless be urged that such religion is too abstract, too coldly scientific, to have any general influence upon action, and can therefore be of no practical value. . . . And it will moreover be asserted with vehemence that, in place of a Father whom men can love and venerate, we are giving them a mere philosophical formula, calling for no warmer feeling than calm intellectual assent. Granting that our doctrine is philosophically the reverse of atheism, it will be urged that here extremes meet, and that an infinite and therefore unknowable God is practically equivalent to no God at all." (p. 468-9.)

In reply to this criticism, Mr. Fiske reminds his readers that "the early Christians were called atheists by their pagan adversaries"; that "as we proceed to take away, one by one, the attributes which limit Deity and enable it to be classified, we seem, no doubt, to be destroying it altogether," yet "the symbolization of Deity indicated by the profoundest scientific analysis of to-day is as practically real as the symbolization which has resulted from the attempts of antiquity to perform such an analysis, and is in every way more satisfactory alike to head and heart." (p. 469.)

This reply cannot be satisfactory to either the careful thinker or the religious devotee. There was no logical or verbal propriety in calling the early Christians atheists, because they recognized in God that which is the very essence of theism, personality and intelligence, and the contemplation of which as the cause of phenomena was the beginning of theism; but the terminal phase of stripping Deity of anthropomorphic qualities does not simply purify and refine the conception of Deity, but divests it of its essential nature, that with which it originated, upon which it is based, and without which prayer, praise, and adoration to God were a mere farce. And it may be added that no amount of scientific culture will ever prepare the people for, or induce them to accept, the "unknowable" or the "unconditioned," as an object of reverence and worship, in the place of a personal, intelligent Deity. When a mind becomes sufficiently emancipated from theology, and sufficiently advanced to appreciate and accept the philosophy which Mr. Fiske has so admirably expounded, it will lose all disposition to worship an unseen Being unless, indeed, it be with him as Strauss says of Schleiermacher, with whom "prayer was the expression of a conscious illusion, partly the result of early habit, partly in view of the congregation which surrounded him; and he intentionally avoided lifting himself above it by his critical consciousness." (Old Faith and New, p. 128.)

But, says Mr. Fiske, "What men have worshipped from the earliest times has been, not the known, but the unknown. Even the primeval savage, who worshipped plants and animals, worshipped them only so far as their modes of action were mysterious to him; only in so far as they constituted a part of the weird, uninterpreted world by which he was surrounded. As soon as he had generalized the dynamic phenomena presented by the plant or the animal,—that is, as soon as it became an object of knowledge,—it ceased to be an object of worship. . . . Though theology has all along wrestled with the insoluble problems presented by this supreme mystery, and, by insisting on divers tangible propositions concerning it, has implicitly asserted that it can be at least partially known, the fact remains that only by being unknown has it continued to be the object of the religious sentiment." (Cosmic Philosophy, Vol. II., p. 421.)

But this paragraph fails to state the whole truth, or the most important one, in connection with the subject treated.

That which is an object of worship is that which the worshipper believes he understands, so far as it has interest for him. He worships a personal intelligence, the operations of which he firmly believes he observes, and which he constantly compares with the processes of which he is himself conscious. It is his own qualities and not the "unknowable" that become the object of his devotion. Just so far as he ascribes his own good qualities to God he loves him, and so far as his God is regarded as bad, he fears him. It is true there is a mystery, but the devotee believes that his religion solves it. As Herbert Spencer says:—

"For though every religion, setting out as it does with the tacit assertion of a mystery, forthwith proceeds to give some solution of this mystery, and so asserts that it is not a mystery, passing human comprehension." (First Principles, p. 45.)

That which is mysterious to the philosopher or the man of science seems perfectly clear to the devotee. He is confident he understands, where the thinker is in doubt. If he worship a fetish, he does so confident that he knows its disposition. His gods are real, conceivable beings, more or less like himself; and, although with the growth of intelligence mysteries arise in connection with the deities, they are the result of speculation, and are an unessential accompaniment, not the objective basis, of religion. It is as a philosopher and not as a religious devotee that man dwells on and gives prominence to the mysteries of the universe.

When man comes to see that the ultimate source of phenomena is unknowable, that it is useless to attempt to form any conception of it, that he cannot properly predicate of it even goodness or intelligence, it must cease to be an object of religious sentiment.

As soon as an object became known to the worshipper, "it ceased to be an object of worship," for the very obvious reason that it ceased to be what it had appeared to be,—what it was believed to be when it was worshipped. When it was worshipped, it was not the mysteriousness of its nature, but the qualities with which it was invested, and its supposed power to benefit or injure man, that constituted the object of religious interest. Now when it is seen that the qualities with which the unknowable has been invested cannot be properly ascribed to it, and that nothing is or can be known in regard to it, it must certainly cease to be an object of religious sentiment. True, when it reaches the ultimate mystery, "science must ever reverently pause, acknowledging the presence of the mystery of mysteries"; but when science pauses, and philosophy acknowledges the inability of the mind to penetrate further, the "Cosmic Theist" claims that the unknown and unknowable will be the object of his religion! But such a religion can have adherents only among those who have reasoned themselves out of the belief in an anthropomorphic deity, but in whose minds there yet linger religious influences which have been inherited and strengthened by education and surroundings. With the surrender of anthropomorphism, the disappearance of the religion of "Cosmic Theism" is only a matter of time. It will never touch the practical life of man nor produce a ripple on the current of religious thought. Mr. Fiske I recognize as one of the most profound and clear-headed thinkers this country has produced, and his exposition of the philosophy of Herbert Spencer shows ability of a high order; but by his own religious feelings or some other cause, he has been betrayed into inconsistencies on the subject, to which I have referred, that appear in strange contrast to his generally lucid and logical treatment of philosophical questions.

Undoubtedly the sentiment of devotion which has been attached to the conception of a personal, intelligent Deity will be greatly modified, as we know it is in individual instances, with a decline of belief in such a being; but its object must be in the future what it has been in the past, man, with this difference,—that whereas in the past man has worshipped unawares his own nature in an imagined objective Being; in proportion as this illusion is discovered he will make his intellectual and moral nature the direct object of his love and devotion, and the improvement of his race, not the glory of God, the object of his efforts. Theology will give way to anthropology, the worship of God to the contemplation of humanity, and to the realization of noble ideals, by the recognition and cultivation in man of all that is lofty and grand in the theological conceptions of God.

"It may not be consonant to usage," says John Stuart Mill, "to call this religion; but the term, so applied, has a meaning, and one which is not adequately expressed by any other word. Candid persons of all creeds may be willing to admit that if a person has an ideal object, his attachment and sense of duty towards which are able to control and discipline all his other sentiments and propensities, and prescribe to him a rule of life, that person has a religion. . . . Many, indeed, may be unable to believe that this object is capable of gathering around it feelings sufficiently strong; but this is exactly the point on which a doubt can hardly remain in an intelligent reader of Comte; and we join him in condemning, as equally irrational and mean, the conception of human nature as incapable of giving its love and devoting its existence to any object which cannot afford in exchange an eternity of personal enjoyment." (Auguste Comte and Positivism, p. 122.) "With the general tenor of this passage," says Fiske, after quoting the above passage from Mill, "I heartily agree. I have no sympathy with those critics who maintain that the idea of humanity is an unworthy idea, incapable of calling forth to a high degree our sentiments of devotion and reverence. . . . We may still further admit that all morality may be summed up in the disinterested service of the race, such being, as already shown, . . . the fundamental principle of the ethical philosophy which is based on the doctrine of evolution. And it is, moreover, easy to sympathize with the feelings which led Comte formally to consecrate the memories of the illustrious dead, whose labors have made us what we are; that 'communion of saints, unseen not yet unreal,' as Carlyle nobly expresses it, 'whose heroic sufferings rise up melodiously together into heaven, out of all times and out of all lands, as a sacred miserere; their heroic actions also, as a boundless, everlasting psalm of triumph.' This intense feeling of the community of the human race, 'this enthusiasm of humanity' as the author of Ecce Homo calls it, forms a very considerable part of Christianity, when stripped of its mythology, and is one of the characteristics which chiefly serve to difference the world-religion of Jesus and Paul from the ethnic religions of antiquity." (Cosmic Philosophy, p. 418, 419.)

It is not necessary that we accept all the views of Comte in regard to making "the human race, conceived as a continuous whole," the object of religious devotion, such as he insists on, or approve his scheme of retaining the forms and symbols of exploded or decaying systems of religion; but the essential idea of his system, that in the future the elements of excellence in man will take the place of an anthropomorphic being as the highest object of man's reverence and love, is in perfect accord with our views as to the tendency and ultimate end of the development and modification of the religious sentiment. Unreasoning worship of an invisible Being will give way to a recognition of man's powers and possibilities, intellectual and moral, and to an "enthusiasm of humanity" which will inspire him with noble sentiments and give a grandeur to human life. But such a change must be slow and gradual. It can take place no faster than philosophic criticism and scientific culture undermine faith in anthropomorphism, and substitute in its place those broader views of Nature which Mr. Fiske has so ably set forth.

I conclude that the coming man will not worship God, but that the time, money, devotion, and enthusiasm which in the past have been lavished on an imaginary Being will in the future be given to the improvement and elevation of the human race.

THE FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND AND PROFESSOR SMITH.

The Rev. Dr. Phillip Schaff, now in Europe, recently contributed to the Independent an extended account of the trial of Professor W. Robertson Smith, "which kept," he says, "the Free Church of Scotland in hot water for the last two years" and "has been disposed of by the General Assembly as far as it can be at this time, although it will come up again, in all probability, before the next Assembly, for final adjustment." We give below the greater part of Dr. Schaff's article:—

It is a question of biblical criticism, as connected with the doctrine of the inspiration and authority of the Holy Scriptures. It is, therefore, proper that the facts in the case should be properly known in America.

We shall first state the salient points of the case as it came before the Assembly yesterday from the Assembly held in Glasgow last year. The charges against Professor Smith are: (1) that he has published and promulgated opinions which contradict or are opposed to the doctrine of the immediate inspiration, infallible truth, and divine authority of the Holy Scriptures, and to the confessional doctrines of prophecy and angels; (2) that he has published writings concerning the books of Scripture which, by their ill-considered and unguarded setting forth of speculations of a critical kind, tend to awaken doubt as to these points; and (3) that his writings, by their neutrality of attitude and rashness of statement in regard to the critical construction of the Scriptures, tend to disparage the divine authority and inspired character of these books. These charges are applied to eight particulars. The first of these particulars is an avowal, under the second general charge, that Professor Smith has promulgated opinions fitted to excite doubt on the proposition "that the Aaronic priesthood and at least a great part of the laws and ordinances of the Levitical system were not divinely instituted in the time of Moses, and that those large parts of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers which represent them as having been then instituted by God were inserted in the inspired records long after the death of Moses." This avowal is supported by a series of quotations from the article "Bible" in the Encyclopædia Britannica, of which the last is mainly relied on as summing up Professor Smith's supposed views, as set forth in this article:—

"In its present shape, the Pentateuch is certainly subsequent to the occupation; for it uses geographical names which arose after that time (Hebron, Dan), refers to the conquest as already accomplished (Deut. xii., 13; Numbers xv., and 32; Genesis xii., 6), and even presupposes the existence of a kingship in Israel (Gen. xxxvi., 31). And with this it agrees that, though there are marked differences of style and language within the book of Joshua, each style finds its counterpart in some section of the Pentateuch. In the subsequent books we find similar phenomena. The last chapters of Judges cannot be separated from the book of Samuel, and the earlier chapters of Kings are obviously one with the foregoing narrative, while all three books contain passages strikingly akin to parts of the Pentateuch and Joshua. Such phenomena not only prove the futility of any attempt to base a theory of authorship on the present division into books, but suggest that the history as we have it is not one narrative carried on from age to age by successive additions, but a fusion of several narratives which partly covered the same ground and were combined into unity by an editor."

This count, the Presbytery of Aberdeen, on the motion of Professor Salmond, seconded by Mr. Johnston, by a majority of 26 to 17 votes, held to be not relevant to sustain against the writings the character libelled. Dissents and complaints were taken to the Synod of Aberdeen, which referred them simpliciter to the Assembly.

The second count is that Professor Smith has taught that the book of Deuteronomy, which is professedly an historical record, does not possess that character, but was made to assume it by a writer of a much later age, who therein, in the name of God, presented in dramatic form instructions and laws as proceeding from the mouth of Moses, though these never were and never could have been uttered by him.

This is the count over which the great fight took place at the Glasgow Assembly in 1878. Sir Henry Moncreiff moved that the particular be held relevant, thus reversing the decision of the Presbytery of Aberdeen. Principal Rainy moved that the dissent and complaint from the Presbytery be dismissed, and the finding of the Presbytery sustained. On a division, Sir Henry's motion was carried by a majority of 23, the numbers voting being 301 against 278.

This action of the Glasgow Assembly against Professor Smith was reaffirmed by this year's Assembly, and the Presbytery of Aberdeen was directed to serve the libel on Professor Smith, and to suspend him till the next meeting of the Assembly judicially from all professional and ministerial functions in the event of finding the libel sustained, either by the admission of Professor Smith or by adequate proof of his views concerning the post-Mosaic authorship and dramatic or quasi-fictional character of Deuteronomy. The final decision is reserved to the next meeting of the Assembly. The motion to that effect was offered and supported in a lengthy address by the venerable Dr. Andrew Bonar, the ex-moderator, and was carried by 321 votes against 319 or 320; that is, with a bare majority of one or two votes. (There is a difference of opinion, not yet decided, as to one vote more or less for the minority.)

The minority voted for the motion of Principal Rainy, to the effect that the Assembly, before proceeding further with the libel, appoint a representative committee, with power to confer with Professor Smith, and to ascertain the best means for arriving at a result securing the truth of God without disturbing the unity of the Church, and to report to the next General Assembly.

The motion of Principal Rainy rallied around it all the liberal and moderate elements, especially the professors and younger ministers. It was favored by men as orthodox and sound as those on the other side who have no sympathy with Professor Smith's critical opinions concerning Deuteronomy, Chronicles, and Canticles. Principal Rainy, of Edinburgh, and Principal Douglas, of Glasgow, in supporting the motion, distinctly declared that they differed from him altogether, but that a certain amount of liberty must be allowed for such opinions and critical investigations concerning the human growth and literary aspects of the Bible, within the limits of the Confession of Faith and a proper recognition of the divine inspiration and authority of the Scriptures. They feared that the severe course proposed by Dr. Bonar's motion, and looking to the deposition of Professor Smith, is likely to lead to serious consequences; for it is very evident that Professor Smith has many sympathizers, especially among the students, who most lustily cheered him and his friends from the gallery whenever they opened their mouths, while some advocates of the other course were rudely interrupted and hissed.

In view of the nearly equal division of the Assembly, it is quite doubtful whether the case will be pressed to its logical consequences, and the ultimate deposition of Professor Smith, by the next Assembly. The Presbytery of Aberdeen and the Assembly itself will exercise all the Scotch caution to prevent a split, if possible. Dr. Bonar's motion triumphed legally, but is almost neutralized morally by the large vote for Dr. Rainy's motion. We have here a conflict between Orthodoxy and liberty. Both must be maintained; but it is extremely difficult to draw the precise line between liberty and license. Professor Smith holds his critical opinions, as he maintains, whether logically or not, in connection with a full belief in the doctrinal system of the Westminster Confession; while his opponents fear that they are the entering wedge of the whole system of German Rationalism, and must logically end in the denial of the divine inspiration and authority of the Bible.

The discussion yesterday excited an intense interest. Long before it began, every seat in the house and the gallery was occupied. Professor Smith entered at 10 A.M., with a carpet-bag and amid loud applause. He made two speeches, which showed great dexterity and pluck and no disposition to make any concession. He looks very youthful and is scarcely over thirty years of age. His friends say that he is a devout and sound Christian man; and he himself asserts that he is in full agreement with the Orthodox system as taught in the Westminster Confession. His opponents charge him with levity and a want of humility. All admit his talents and varied learning. He is a precocious genius, who is said to be fit for a chair of mathematics and natural philosophy, as well as Oriental languages and exegesis. The discussion was very warm on both sides, but taken up too much with preliminary questions of order and legal technicalities, instead of entering into the merits of the grave question itself. In fact, it was a legal rather than theological contest. Its ultimate issue it is impossible to foresee. It is one of those irrepressible conflicts which time only can solve. Whatever may be its immediate consequences, it will result at last, like all similar controversies, in the advancement of truth.

MR. EMERSON ON MEMORY.

The interest in the Concord School of Philosophy culminated yesterday afternoon when Mr. Emerson gave his lecture on "Memory." The interest in the famous Concord author was so great that the audience would not be contained within the "Orchard House," and the vestry of the Congregational Church, a room that seats comfortably two hundred persons, was obtained for this purpose. Mr. Emerson is a prophet not without honor even in his own country and among his own kith and kin. The vestry was so crowded that many had to be turned away. There was neither seating nor standing room for any more. The thermometer had the misfortune to rise to about ninety degrees, and the state of the audience can be better imagined than described. Yet they had come to see and hear Mr. Emerson, and would have been present had the weather been even hotter than it was. The fact that he has now greatly lost his memory, and, though in tolerably good health, is really an old man, drew many people to hear him, besides the persons who are attending the philosophical school. Among them was one of Mr. Emerson's classmates at Harvard, Mr. J. B. Hill, of Mason, N.Y., a vigorous old gentleman, rather short for his size, who sat next to his illustrious friend during the reading of the lecture, and seemed to take in every word with great enjoyment.

Other strangers were Hon. George S. Boutwell and his daughter Miss Georgiana Boutwell, Mrs. A. J. Ryckoff of Cleveland, Senator Hoar, Rev. Dr. H. N. Powers of Bridgeport, Conn., and Rev. E. F. Howe of Newtonville. Miss Emerson attended her father and acted as his assistant, but Mr. Emerson got through remarkably well. His voice was the clear, distinct voice of other days; he did not lose his interest in what he was saying, either from badness of memory or physical weariness; the peculiar Emersonian emphasis was there as of yore; you knew when he struck an idea he liked by the smile that played upon his features as he uttered the words, and by a certain tenderness of tone; and the large audience sat in almost perfect silence, save when the humor made one laugh, from the beginning to the end of the reading. It was one of the most intelligent and select companies that could have been gathered. Though largely composed of ladies, every face showed the intelligence that comes from culture and character. Mr. Emerson held out wonderfully. Though he had to ask his daughter's assistance occasionally, it was only for a moment, and his enthusiasm went with what he said to the very end. It was Emerson more as he was twenty years ago than most persons have seen him in recent years, and the occasion was thus one of marked interest for all who heard him. The lecture itself has been so much talked about and reported that no sketch, which Mr. Emerson expressly requested should not be made, need be given. He regarded memory as the primary sentimental faculty, without which none other can work, and went on in sentences, brilliant, clear, imaginative, to unfold, in his own peculiar way,—the method of the poet rather than that of the logician,—the powers and peculiarities of memory as they had struck him. But the most significant thing in the whole lecture was Mr. Emerson's own difficulty in making the very faculty he was discoursing about obedient to his own will. The audience seemed thoroughly well satisfied with what they received. The chief enjoyment was, of course, the hearing of Mr. Emerson once more, and of seeing him engaged in this very work to which he was the first to give emphasis and importance in this country,—the delivering of literary lectures. Another rare treat is promised for the Concord people and for the members of the school of philosophy next Wednesday evening, August 6, when Mr. H. G. O. Blake of Worcester, the editor of Thoreau's writings, will read extracts from his unpublished manuscript. The Concord school has yet nearly two weeks to continue.—Boston Sunday Herald, Aug. 3.

SOME TESTIMONY AS TO JEWS.

A Chicago correspondent of the New York Herald, in view of the sensation produced by the Corbin edict, interviewed the landlords of some of the leading hotels of that city, with the following result:—

Mr. John B. Drake, of the Grand Pacific Hotel, said that in his thirty years' experience as hotel-keeper he never had any trouble with Jews. They always conducted themselves properly, and he thought that a landlord would be very foolish to make such a general order as that attributed to Mr. Corbin. He had always found them the best of guests, and never had more honorable or prompt-paying ones.

At the Palmer House, the expression was one of pronounced condemnation of the order. The Jews were as fine-paying customers as the house had.

Mr. John A. Rice, of the Tremont House, condemned the act. In all his experience, he had never had any occasion to regret the presence of Jews in his house; they were tip-top pay, and always prompt. No Jew in his career had ever attempted to beat his way, and plenty of them have been his guests.

Mr. Alvin Hurlburt, of the Sherman House, considered the Jewish trade as good as any. They always wanted the best, but were willing to pay for it.

The last number of the Catholic Mirror contains a long article on "Corbin and the Jews," from which we make the following extract: "Mr. Corbin's action gives us an opportunity to say that we do not share the vulgar prejudice against Jews. We have no antipathy to them. We admire them for many good qualities. They are industrious. No one ever meets a Hebrew loafer or beggar. They are sober. No one ever sees a drunkard who is an Israelite. They are law-abiding. Very, very seldom is there a Jew criminal brought before our courts. They are moral. Rarely is it known that a Jew is guilty of baseness, and nearly all their families are large and the children are healthy and intelligent. They are peaceful. There are no brawlers and rowdies among them. Indeed, taking the children of Israel as a class, there are no better citizens anywhere. They have so many civic virtues as to deserve to be called a praiseworthy people."

The Art Amateur, the Music Trade Review, the Home Journal, the Stage, and the Aquatic Monthly are among the New York journals which Corbin cannot read because they are edited by Jews. For the same reason, he cannot read the Sun, Herald, World, Times, Staats-Zeitung, Star, or Evening News, which employ Jews as reporters.—Jewish Times.

WHAT COL. INGERSOLL SAYS.

Queen Victoria is credited with the remark that "it takes three generations to make a gentleman," and as it is about ninety years, more or less, since her ancestors—the three Georges—reigned, rioted, and ruined, their present royal posterity ought to be reasonably pure. Brutal bigotry insists that you can never make a Jew clean, a negro human, or an Irishman grateful; and the man Corbin, who has just been making Coney Island the appropriate pulp for a sermon on the influence of money, is trying the first of these propositions. Robert G. Ingersoll writes to J. J. Noah, son of the great editor, from his home, 1417 G Street, Washington, D.C., a letter from which I take this remarkable passage:—

"When we remember that God selected a Jewess for his mother, passing by the women of India, Egypt, Athens, and Rome, as well as the grandmother of Mr. Corbin, it is hardly in good taste for the worshippers of the same God to hold the Jews in scorn."

"We should also remember that the Jews were the only people inspired. All the 'sacred' writers, all the 'prophets,' were of this race; and while Christians almost worship Abraham, notwithstanding the affair of Hagar and his willingness to murder his own son, and while they hold in almost infinite respect David the murderer, and Solomon the Mormon, it certainly is not perfectly consistent to denounce men and women of the same race, who have committed no crime.

"The Christians have always been guilty of this inconsistency with regard to the Jews,—they have worshipped the dead and persecuted the living. I think it would be much better to let the dead take care of themselves, while we respect and maintain the rights of the living."

"I cannot forget that, during the Revolution, the Jews prayed in their synagogues for the success of the Colonies. I cannot forget that, during our civil war, thousands of them fought for the preservation of the Union, many of them rising from the ranks to the most important commands. Neither can I forget that many of the Jews are to-day among the foremost advocates of intellectual liberty; that they have outgrown the prejudices of race and creed, and believe in the universal brotherhood of men. And in this connection it may not be out of place to speak of your father. He was a man who adorned every position he held, and who, as lawyer, judge, essayist, and philanthropist, was an honor to his race and to my country."

"It will not do in this, the second century of the United States, to insult a gentleman because of his nation."

"We are, at last, a great, rich, and prosperous people. Greatness should be great, wealth should be generous, and prosperity should, at least, beget good manners."

"Every American should resent every insult to humanity; for while the right of the lowest are trampled upon, the liberties of the highest are not safe."

"While for the ancient myths and fables of your people I have not the respect entertained by Christians, I still hold the rights of Jews to be as sacred as my own."—Progress.

Mrs. JENNIE STIRLING publishes a poem beginning, "Where shall I find my boy?" Well, we can tell you. You want to run straight down the Agency road, past the first farm outside the city limits, and then, if you trot along pretty lively, when you get about twenty-five feet ahead of the man, and about, say, eleven feet ahead of the dog, you will find your boy, with a paper bag full of strawberries crushed under his arm, doing his level best to increase his lead on the dog. But you want to hump yourself, for when we last looked at the procession it wasn't standing still, not by about eighty-five miles an hour.—Burlington Hawkeye.

ON THE HEIGHTS.

BY HELEN T. CLARK.

Far up the dizzy heights of Alpine splendor,
Beyond the ruthless touch of human hand,
A crown of beauty on a stalklet slender,
The flower of "noblesse oblige" doth stand!

The clouds of evening tinge it rose and violet,—
The moonbeams kiss it into mystic grace;
No print of foot may reach it or defile it,—
No trail of serpent find its hiding-place.

The sounds of earth-born strife, of mortal sorrow,
Die into silence ere they reach its cleft;
Clothed on with light from morrow unto morrow
It blooms, the purest thing that sin has left.

And, chiming clear and high about its dwelling,
The music of the monastery bells,
Sweet as a flute, then diapason swelling,
Beats on its wings a prayer from convent cells.

So one true life, above all petty hating,
Above the fies of envy, rage, and scorn,
Lives on, its steady purpose naught abating,
That men shall bless the hour it was born.

Crimsoned with noble fires of high endeavor,
Soul-swayed by harmonies of truth divine,
Hearing the slanderous tongues, but heeding never,
It gathers to itself the fair and fine.

Of other lives—the music of the singers,
The rapt creations of the artist's brain,
The poet's dreams—all are its harvest-bringers,
That it may reap another's scanty gain.

Brave and unselfish, knightly, true, and tender,
To weak and sinful ones a shielding hand,—
Not up the dizzy heights of Alpine splendor
Doth flower of "Edelweiss" more fragrant stand.

The Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 14, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. Tolendo Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

THE WORK OF RATIONALISM.

It remains, after the survey of rationalism we have taken, its present condition and needs, but to briefly indicate more explicitly the specific work before it, and submit a few practical hints as to the immediate steps toward its prosecution. The course of rationalism up to this time has been mainly an intellectual movement. Its energies have been mainly given to destructive criticism, with a gradual and increasing drift, through the influence of science in its various forms, toward the evolution of a consistent and perfected system of philosophy. But its work has been for the most part theoretical rather than practical, and hence its influence in respect to social reformation of an indirect instead of a direct character. While there has been no real, genuine work of social or moral reform in which rationalism has not participated, and even led not unfrequently, it has been enabled to practically initiate and carry forward but little purely in accordance with its own intrinsic principles. There are, among those who profess to be in sympathy with radicalism, some who are satisfied with this mode of working, and consider it, under the circumstances, to be preferred. They maintain that it is better to waive the differences between them and their intellectually less advanced fellow-workers in such reforms, for the sake of the greater end in view, since there can thus be secured a coöperation that could not be otherwise. But while this latter conclusion no doubt is true, the compact is always at the expense of a less or greater compromise of rationalistic conviction and principles. Indeed, so obvious is this, as a general rule, that what is gained by the compromise is likely to be nearly or quite offset by the large number of rationalists who are, in consequence of it, repelled. Still further, it may be questioned whether the tendency which is thus engendered to mental and moral obliquity, insincerity, and the habit of acting with an undue regard to expediency, with its attendant loss of the force of self-assertion and conviction, do not exceed in such instances all that may be contributed apart from those of individual influence and power. But, be this as it may, so long as rationalism is without coherency, distracted and divided, this state of things, as has hitherto been intimated, is inevitable. With consolidation and union, it could mark out its own characteristic path of effort, and pursue it; it could institute the plans of its work, and fashion it according to its own distinguishing principles.

Proceeding, then, upon the supposition of such a union, if not an immediate realization, at least as the prospective ultimate one, of rationalism, let us see what avenues of service await and invite it; in other words, what may be added to that progressive influence and power which it already exercises and represents, and how this may become more effectual in transforming and advancing the life of the world.

This has been, in a general way, already indicated. Let us contemplate it in its moral and social aspects. Evidently, such work must have in view the reconstruction and perfection of the social condition, and must proceed in accordance with rationalistic principles,—those laws, in other words, of Nature and life that are revealed through science. Emerson has pointed out, with his usual wonderful insight and force, in one of his essays, how a large portion of our legislative enactments and reformatory efforts come to nothing because of the want of radical apprehensions and methods. We spend our energies and means, he tells us, in making laws, and in endeavors to correct and improve society, from which we might have been spared, if the same expenditure had been given to enlightened education and the better training of individuals.

The stream which floods the land and carries ruin everywhere in its course might have been stayed, if, instead of the artificial barriers to which we resort, we had earlier strengthened and cared for its embankments. There can be no true reformation of the social status that does not begin at the beginning. Rationalism must therefore, first of all, recognize the importance of having the individual members of society well born in all respects, physically, mentally, and morally. An immense amount of the evils of the world, the defects of our individual characters, and the troubles of our individual experience are the result of neglect and inconsideration in respect to the conditions of this fundamental requirement of human existence. The time will come when it will be seen how much barbarity in this particular, with all our high advancement and enlightenment, inheres in the civilization of to-day. But to remedy this, we need more intelligent ideas of marriage. It needs to be something more than the mere hap-hazard arrangement which it too often is at present. This is not to be effected through the vile modes for its pseudo-amendment which some advocate, and would put in practice, but by those adapted to secure the highest and best parentage; that shall afford in some reasonable degree a guarantee against many of the ills which, from the want of the exercise of such wisdom, are now entailed upon the generations. With this higher conception of marriage and the requisites for its harmonious fellowship and sense of the responsibility of parentage, there must be associated a correspondent superior enlightenment in respect to the training of the young, not alone in the home, but in the school and our general system of education. We need to exalt and dignify the office of motherhood. We need to sweeten, purify, and refine the family relations; to emphasize not only the "rights" which belong to its individual members without regard to sex, but also the importance of a rightly equivoled and pervading spirit of reciprocity throughout the whole of such relationship. We hail with joy the premonitions of such a realization of this. Especially do we hail with such emotions the promise of powerful influence to this end in the kindergarten movement in this country, which, though it may yet be to a considerable extent in an immature and unperfected condition, is nevertheless a most important and significant sign of the time in respect to the nurture of children and education, not only in its effect upon the child, but the mother and home life in general.

But not alone in these earlier stages of life is our education to undergo a change, but in its higher ones as well. Our whole school and college system is in need of readjustment and reformation. It needs to be eliminated of much which is an inheritance of the past in its conceptions of the essentials of education, as well as in its methods; to be more harmoniously adapted to the newer knowledge, advancing intelligence, and practical requirements of the civilization of to-day. Happily, this work is being undertaken and carried forward by professional educators with considerable vigor, although with a very manifest half-way conservatism and reluctance mingling with such efforts. It is the work of rationalism to encourage and support this tendency, so far as it evinces itself to be sufficiently thorough and judicious. It can at least insist that education shall be non-ecclesiastical and theological; that it shall be in a greater preponderance scientific; and that it shall be moral in accordance with the highest discovered principles of ethics.

Then there are, in addition to this comprehensive work of education in all its branches, to which we have referred, in which rationalism should participate so far as it may, numerous causes for the amelioration and improvement of the general welfare.

Before all others, there are the problems to be grappled with that are induced in consequence of the existing derangements of society in respect to the relative degree of comforts and the means of livelihood among its members; of the true adjustment of the relation of capital and labor; the abolition of pauperism and the relief of the helpless and unfortunate of the community. To initiate and further to the utmost of its resources such devices to this end as the Colony Aid Society of New York, of which we published an account in THE INDEX last week, and correspondent ones of humanity and charity; to array itself at all times and everywhere on the side of all wise and true philanthropy, all really advanced conceptions of social and civil order and purity, against persecution and injustice to every class, nationality, or race, whether white or black, man or woman, Indian, African, or Chinaman, Jew or Gentle,—this is the work to which rationalism, with all its accumulating force of conviction, intelligence, latent moral susceptibility, and swelling numbers, in this its day of maturity and strength, is summoned; and woe, woe to it, and to humanity, if that summons is unheeded.

But in order to make a fitting response to this appeal, it is imperatively necessary that it should put itself into the condition to make its objects and aspirations more effective. It must, first of all, have organization through which to operate and make itself felt. Without this,—some tangible, visible centres of influence through which to impel and guide its activities, and prosecute its purposes, and join hands, as it were, with other bodies and communities of allies and workers for great general ends,—rationalism, with all the advantages which the times afford it, and will still afford, must continue to sit at the feet of the scorner, and, as a distinct system or movement, exercise but a comparatively small influence upon the world's affairs.

A "GOOD" MAN stood at an angle of some of the more travelled walks on the Common, last Sunday, with a satchel of tracts, which he proffered with a look of half-serious and half-smiling grace to the passers-by. They were printed on pink paper, which, inasmuch as the subject presented was of a somewhat sanguinary character, seemed fittingly chosen, and were the issue, as they stated, of the Believers' Book Rooms. The one which we were favored with bore the title "What is the Gospel? A Word to the Anxious," which, in consideration of the learned wisdom that has been expended and the tomes that have been written on the above question to answer it, might seem a little like presumption or overdoing the condensing process to find it all dispatched in two or three sentences of the 32mo sheet before us. The little leaflet referred to took it for granted that we and all into whose hand it came were very anxious,—a supposition, so far as the subject of it was concerned, of which we should have been very happy to relieve the mind of the author. Indeed, judging from the disposition made of them and the indifference and small amount of interest they appeared to awaken, this appeared a quite general state of feeling. The tract assumed to give a complete diagnosis of our spiritual condition, and referred to chapter and verse of the Bible for concurring testimony. It would have been nothing more than a justifiable exercise of fair play and becoming exhibition of correspondent zeal if some freethinker should take his stand near by to imitate on Sunday this mode of propagating the faith that is in him. We should hope for better results in such a case than in that of the one just referred to. By a close mathematical calculation based on the number scattered on the ground in the vicinity, we arrived at the conclusion that 64 out of every 100 dropped them as soon as they looked at them, as if stung by some venomous insect; but 1 in 187½ read them, and upon only 1 in 4877½ did they produce even the most infinitesimal impression. But as the employment seemed to be favorable to the printing interest, which we are disposed to regard as a very deserving one, and afforded an opportunity for people to "do good" who could see no worthier one and needed an outlet for their zeal and piety, we consoled ourselves with an optimistic view of the matter, and were reconciled.

ONE OF THE MOST despicable and pitiable tales of Indian wrongs which has been heard for a good while, is that which has been related recently with regard to the Poncas in this city. These people are harmless and peaceable. Whatever justice there might be in other instances in speaking of Indians as blood-thirsty, the designation certainly could not be applied to them. They dwell on lands ceded to them by a specific treaty from the government, and successively confirmed by subsequent ones. They could hardly be longer considered barbarous. They had cultivated farms, and houses, barns, churches, and school-houses, and had, furthermore, never been known to kill a white person. These cultivated lands and possessions were tempting spoil to the plundering escape-graces of the Indian ring, and they determined to rob their defenceless owners of them. By chicanery, falsehood, and fraudulent representations of every possible description that their heartless ingenuity could devise, they persistently sought to carry out the atrocious design. It is a most unmitigated and touching story of suffering and wrong. The poor Indians were at last prevailed upon, in obedience to what they supposed the power of the government, to abandon their property and homes and remove to a portion of the Indian reservation hundreds of miles away. Thence they have been twice removed, and have been exposed to sickness, starvation, and wretchedness in various forms. Their original number has diminished nearly one-half. In ten months, from July 15, 1878, when they were moved to where they now are, one hundred and ten of their number had died. The case of the Poncas is but a specimen of the wrong and outrage to which the aborigines of this country have continually been subject from the white man, and especially from the government which is bound by right to be their protector. Mr. Phillips quoted, the other day, the testimony, before a committee of Congress, of Gen. Harney, one of the oldest and most experienced officers in the army, in respect to Indian affairs. Gen. Harney declared that in sixty years of army service, most of it on the frontier, in close relation to the Indians, he had never known an Indian to break a treaty, and he had never known the government to keep one. Mr. Tibbles, who has undertaken the benevolent mission of pleading the cause of the Poncas in Boston, and who is sufficiently accredited to be entitled to all confidence, disclaimed any intention to charge the President or the heads of the government with the grievances of the Indians. The fault, he maintained, was in the existing system or policy pursued with reference to these people. There is very little hope of redress in such cases, or of protection for the Indians, so long as they have no rights in the courts. At present, they are before the law in the same condition which the famous Judge Tanney decision pronounced to be then that of the blacks in this country,—without any rights that a white man is bound to respect.

OATHS AND THE TRUTH.

If profanity is to be defined as the taking of holy names in vain, the average official oath of our time can hardly escape coming under the definition. On the plane of a certain low grade of religious faith where superstition still largely prevails, the official oath may still possibly serve a good purpose in the support of truth. It belongs to a primitive and crude order of religious belief, which conceives of God as a vigilant policeman, with eye alert in the most secret places for delinquents, rather than as the indwelling substance of truth itself in the human mind, keeping speech and conduct upright by its own self-police. And where this primitive belief really survives, the oath may have a surviving usefulness.

But, on the other hand, when we think of the meaningless formalism into which the once solemn form of administering the oath has generally fallen, of the hasty and often inaudible repetition of words of which neither party appears to have any adequate sense, of the perjury which must necessarily often attend the form, and of the wide-spread scepticism in respect to the special religious doctrine which gave to the old form of oath the chief validity that it possessed, we can but question whether for large classes of people and many occasions the form has not outlived its fitness for civilized society; and whether for all classes and all occasions some new form of solemn address to the conscience may not be found which shall both better serve the cause of truth, and more faithfully represent the religious belief and the moral sentiment of the present age.

The formal oath in many cases, indeed, has become a farce instead of a solemnity, and is serviceable neither to truth nor virtue. When the meaning has gone out of it, the oath becomes in itself a lie, even though the truth may be told under it; and every such sham is an injury to private conscience and to public morals. The really honorable person can but feel humiliated when, as if his word were doubted, he must needs confirm it by an oath,—especially if, as often happens, the oath involve a religious faith which is not his own. Then he is not only humiliated, but he must make a protest against this confounding of honesty with religious opinion, and is not infrequently legally wronged and made to suffer a penalty for thus truthfully expressing his views. The most honest man, the one whose testimony is really needed, is thus sometimes ruled out of court. As a matter of fact, the simple affirmation of a man known to be honest will outweigh the sworn evidence of a dozen men known to be dishonest. We say of some men that their word is as good as their bond, and we know of no oath that could make the testimony of such men surer. With all this class of men the oath is needless; and with many of them it is a violation of conscience.

But how to bring society as a whole up to their level of honesty is the problem. How secure, if possible, truthful testimony from those whose characters are not known at all or who are likely to be dishonest? No one method may offer a perfect solution. But we may expect in the future to see the principle of honor taking the place of the formal oath in the affairs of civil government, as it does already to large extent among military men, and in the judicial decisions of the British House of Lords. This is a principle of great educational value, and may be made a much more powerful agent than it is in human affairs. Especially should parents and teachers cultivate and appeal to it in their dealings with the young. Frequently the sentiment of honor may be reached before the homelier sentiments of honesty and truthfulness can be touched. The opposite of honor in the vocabulary of the young is meanness; and a child will frequently show sensitive ness to the charge of meanness who seems callous to every other moral appeal. The sentiment of honor may thus be used as an aid in moral culture, to introduce and shelter virtues much nobler than itself. Honor and honesty are, indeed, at root closely akin; as the words have the same etymological origin, so the qualities belong to one stock. We may say that they are two aspects of the same virtue. Honor is common every-day honesty in the garb of chivalry.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

A SON OF George W. Curtis graduated at Harvard this year.

DONALD G. MITCHELL (Ik Marvel) has been seriously ill, but is now recovering.

D. A. WASSON has lectured before the Concord School of Philosophy upon "Social Structure."

REV. THOMAS K. BEECHER is said to favor cremation, and would like to organize a stock company to go into the business.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY'S daughter Marian was recently married in London to a son of the Right Honorable Sir Robert Collier.

MRS. NELLIE T. BRIGHAM, the popular Spiritualist lecturer, spoke in the Universalist church at Brattleboro, Vt., last Sunday.

PARKER PILLSBURY thinks "the Church to-day is as ready as ever to die and kill for the sake of its cause, and would crush all infidels and freethinkers if it had the power."

THE RUSSIAN "RAILWAY PRINCE" Herr Pollakoff, an Orthodox Jew, has forwarded to the Minister of Public Instruction the sum of two hundred thousand roubles, as an endowment for the benefit of poor students.

MR. GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS and Professor Charles E. Norton are giving at Ashfield, Mass., their summer residence, a series of readings from English and American authors, for the benefit of the academy of the town. They give one reading a week.

PROFESSOR EDWARD S. MORSE will return from Japan soon. It is said that he has made important discoveries in the region of Tokio. A series of farewell demonstrations in honor of him are contemplated in Japan, as a recognition of his signal services to that country.

REV. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, Mr. Conway writes, is in decidedly better health than he was when he left America. He has been for several weeks at Ragatz, and from thence will go southward and pass the winter in Italy. He is in cheerful spirits, notwithstanding the exceptionally rude season with which Europe has received him.

HERBERT SPENCER is reported to have been much benefited in health by his sojourn on the Continent, and will be able in consequence to throw much more energy into his works on sociology than he has for some time. His secretaries are kept constantly employed. It is thought that when he may feel the need of rest again he will visit this country.

ROBERT COLLYER writes of Thoreau: "When Parker Pillsbury went to see him as he lay a-dying, he said; 'Thoreau, you are so near the line now, can you not see something of the other side,—some glimpse or gleam of the waiting world?' 'One world at a time, Parker,' he whispered cheerily. And it was the watchword, as it seems to me, of his whole life."

HON. JOHN W. GREENWOOD died at Paris, Stark County, Ohio, August 6. Mr. Greenwood was in the eightieth year of his age at the time of his decease. He had lived at Paris for the last fifty-three years. During all his life, he was an independent and uncompromising freethinker. He was noted for superior intelligence, integrity, and moral worth. Mr. Underwood was the guest of Mr. Greenwood when he lectured in Paris, last month.

PROF. R. A. PROCTOR writes of a report of his death that has been circulated in this country, as follows: "As to my being dead, I cannot but think this is a mistake. The study of science suggests extreme caution about matters of fact. But, so far as my own observation extends, I find reason to believe that I am alive. My friends also seem to think so. You must not think me dogmatic, if—failing stronger evidence than I yet possess to the contrary—I decline to accept unhesitatingly the theory that I am no longer living."

G. W. SMALLLEY, the London correspondent of the New York Tribune, writes that M. de Lesseps, though seventy-three years old, is "one of the youngest men now living. He does not look a day older than when I saw him at the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869. He is just as erect in figure and alert in manner, his eye is as bright and full, and his conversation has all the old power and vivacity which coaxed incredulous capitalists into finding money for piercing the Isthmus. He has now embarked, as you know, on a new undertaking, and is going to make a ship canal from the Atlantic to the Pacific by way of Panama. On this he talks, as of old, with the utmost freedom, with a confidence which knows no limits. He discusses it with as much zeal and zeal as if he were a boy with the future all before him, and his fame and fortune yet to make. Yesterday this septuagenarian youth devoted a long afternoon in the city to business, sat through a long dinner, appeared about midnight at Mrs. Millais' party, having his hostess Mrs. Douglass Murray on his arm, and spent two or three hours in that brilliant company. At two this morning I saw him waiting airily with a young lady who might have been his granddaughter."

HISTORICALISM: A METHOD.

History is the backbone of all the sociological knowledges: of political economy, law, and government, mental philosophy, ethics, and religion. For natural science, the case is often quite different. Here, by the very nature of progress, the usefulness of the past series of things learned may be all kept in the front of the science as it advances, and the history of these past labors may remain like the row of camels, skeletons on a desert road, showing how far the predecessors had got when they broke down. Science is constantly changing. Man, however, is eternally man; and the lessons of his individual or associated life ten thousand years ago are as instructive, so far as the records are good, as the like lessons to-day.

The first law, or at least a first law, of this doctrine of historicalism is as universal as the famous scientific dictum, Omne vivum ex ovo, "all life derives from some egg"; and it may be stated almost as tersely in Latin: Omne primum ex tenebris, "every origin is from amidst darkness." In no particular is the progress of real knowledge more distinct than in the gradual substitution of acknowledged unknown beginnings for definite but unsoundly and ignorantly conceived ones. It follows at once from this law, that the method of historical research must be backward in time; that is, that we must do exactly as all scientific investigators do,—begin with things that we know and advance towards those that we do not. All the real sciences observe this rule; pseudo sciences invert it, and the old false doctrines of sciences inverted it. Astrology, for instance, began with an assumption that the planets have an influence on human life, and it continues to presuppose the same. You could not coax an astrologer to go into an exhaustive scientific induction to see just what proportion of horoscopes do in fact agree with the aspects of the stars at birth, and what do not.

All the recent advances in historical knowledge have been made in accordance with this law. The old system of Roman history accepted the legend of the wolf and Acca Laurentia, Romulus and Remus, and so on, and deduced all the later history of Rome easily from them. Then came the scientific investigations of Niebuhr and his school, and Romulus and Remus went into nothingness along with Egeria; and we now have statements about the early history of Rome not nearly so complete as the legend, but infinitely more genuine. The fact is, that in all the primeval beginnings of history truth and completeness are in an inverse ratio to each other. A story all filled out with continuous circumstances and complete detail of the origin of a race is pretty sure to be a legend containing not more than some mere hint or much transformed jot of partial truth.

ANOTHER CREED.

MR. EDITOR:—

I, too, think Mr. Daniel Cony's suggestion for rationalists to give through your columns their principal religious affirmations or beliefs is a good one, and consequently present herewith mine, earnestly hoping that friend Cony can say amen to all of them, and that some others may be induced to make a similar statement.

My creed or declaration of principles is:—

1. I believe that each and all of the numerous and more or less contradictory so-called "Divine Revelations," "Christa," etc., etc., that ever have been, or ever will be, in existence in the world, were, and always will be, enormously fraudulent, and consequently must be, however excellent some of their ideas, very far from being purely good guides for humanity to adopt or follow.

2. I believe that reason, freely and fully exercised, and enlightened by observation, study, and experience, is, however defective, the nearest approach to a purely good, and therefore the very best, guide and standard that mankind ever has had, or ever will have.

3. I believe that the worship of the entire existence of the great creative and controlling Power of the universe, which we call the Deity or God, is an adoration of evil as well as good, for the reason that both good and evil are alike the result of some creation or permission on the part of Deity, and cause God to be,—whether Nature or Jehovah,—in common with man, an unfit object of worship as a whole.

4. I believe that goodness, pure and true, whether exhibited by Deity or humanity, or both together, is the only proper and worthy object of adoration and worship for mankind, and that the best religion is that which is devoted to the purification and increase of goodness in man, leaving the glory of God wholly to the care and attention of the powers of Deity.

5. I believe it is utterly silly and superstitious to suppose that God—whatever God may be—will be so monstrously foolish as to permit anything to which God has even the least objection, in religious or any other matters, and consequently that mankind can rest perfectly satisfied that all things needful to God's honor and glory will be most thoroughly attended to, whether humanity is willing or not, and without mankind needing to trouble themselves about it in any way.

6. I believe that the whole duty of man is never to do to another anything you would blame that other for doing to you, and to make as much progress in the knowledge, practice, and promotion of pure goodness as your circumstances permit.

LEGACIES.

"Sweet is a legacy, and passing sweet
The unexpected death of some old lady."

—Byron.

That depends! How much is the legacy, and who is the old lady, and did she leave it to us?

Among the hardships that we radicals have to put up with, is sometimes to be left out in the cold in this matter of legacies, and because of our radicalism. The foes of a radical are oftentimes those of his own household, and the enmity is expressed by diverting the inheritance which of right belongs to kindred and friends, to religious charities, so called, but which are better named, frequently, religious wastes or superstitions. The weak and feeble-minded often suppose they can win favor with God by bequests to the Church, and this course is too often helped along by the venal priests who minister to this fear, especially during a last sickness, when the mind shares the body's weakness.

The death of the old lady was not "unexpected." Unfortunately she did not love us less, but she loved the Church and "my" Jesus more; and hence all her property was bequeathed to purchase Bibles, hymn and prayer-books of the Episcopal service, and for the support of like fooleries.

For this do "I wreak the wrath that garners in my heart" upon this gigantic swindle, called the "Church," which has swallowed up the untold wealth of nations in the past, and whose insatiable maw is continually crying, with the daughters of the horse-leech, Give!

May we not quote, as pertinent to the present day, as when uttered by Lucretius?—

"Tantum religio potuit suadere malorum"

THE PONCA INDIANS.

Yesterday's meeting in the Melancon in behalf of the Ponca Indians was so well attended, and the sympathy with the suffering red men was so positive, that it would be very strange if some practical benefit to them should not follow. The hall was so well filled as to look full, and all the details of the meeting were carried out as advertised,—a feature worth mentioning, because it is no unusual matter to have "distinguished speakers" fail to appear. A strong indignation prevailed against the Indian ring, judging from the demonstrations of the audience, and if the spirit shown can be carried out to its full desire, the Indian ring will lose its power and the greatly abused aborigines will at least receive justice. It was noticeable that the audience included few business men, but had a large proportion of women and those who are semi-professional philanthropists. For two hours they listened to the speakers with close attention; very few went out, and when the resolutions were adopted there was not a voice in the negative.

Mayor Prince's Address.

Soon after twelve, Mr. B. W. Williams called the meeting to order, and stated that it was held in the Melancon because mechanics were busy in the hall above. Mention was made that the Rev. E. E. Hale desired much to be there, but, in his enforced absence, had sent a series of resolutions. Mayor Prince was then introduced, and he began at once upon the main theme of the meeting. The people of Boston, he said, have never been called to assist any one more wretched than the Ponca Indians, who have been victims of the most treacherous injustice, cruelty, and oppression, not from other Indian tribes nor from savage frontiersmen, but from those miscreants, the Indian ring, protected by the government and organized for the robbery and wrong of the weak and defenceless. It should be the policy of the United States to protect the Indians, to induce them to abandon their nomadic ways and to adopt the pursuits of civilized life. The nation should exercise a paternal guardianship over them [applause]; perhaps, as far as legislation goes, it does; but as all laws which are not enforced are of little value, it may be said without fear of contradiction that the administration of our Indian affairs has been a failure. The Indian has been protected on paper, but constantly ill-treated and abused, with no judicial tribunal to interfere in his behalf. It is not strange that, goaded to madness by his intolerable wrongs, he has sometimes sought in war that redress denied him elsewhere. The Indian ring has been organized for years to oppress and plunder this unfortunate race, and the impunity with which they practise these hideous cruelties has disgraced the government and dishonored the American name. [Applause.] It would not be difficult to show that most of our Indian wars have been caused by the oppressions of this ring and their allies, the half-civilized whites on the frontier, who, coveting the Indian reservations, have cheated, robbed and forced the Indians into acts of retaliation, so as to excite the government to employ its forces against them. The English have no trouble with the Indians, because they treat them justly, and as human beings, with rights entitled to the respect and protection of the government. [Applause.] The treatment of the Ponca Indians transcends in cruelty and atrocity all the wrongs perpetrated by the strong against the weak yet disclosed in that part of the country. Its parallel can only be found in barbarous wars among barbarous nations, and it seems most strange that, in a civilization boasting so much philanthropy and refinement, men can be found who dare so to outrage public sentiment and defy public opinion. These Indians are well-behaved and inoffensive; they have broken no laws or treaties; they have abandoned savage life; they have organized a well-governed society; they have engaged in agriculture and in other peaceful pursuits; they are industrious and laborious; they have built homes, schools, and churches; they had become an orderly and respectable community. But their lands—their property—were coveted by the ring, and a devilish contrivance was resorted to for their possession. Fraud, perjury, and force were at last successful. These persecuted wretches were despoiled of their happy homes and sent into a pestilential place, where large numbers of them have died and others are daily dying. The sad story of these unfortunate Indians has excited the just indignation of our people wherever it is known, and it has forced the ring to an attempt to excuse or explain their foul cruelties, but the explanation is so thin and absurd as to insult common sense and common honesty. [The mayor at this point read the statement of the Indian Department officials published in Monday's Advertiser. Then he continued.] Believing, as I suppose we all do, that the complaint of these Indians is founded on truth, the question for consideration is the remedy for the evil. Now I don't believe in memorials to Congress. The ring will misrepresent facts, and the wrong will be made to appear the right. Delays will wear away the patience of the petitioners, and at last justice will be denied. There is only one power which can remedy the wrong and restore to this persecuted tribe its lands and its rights. That is the judicial power. [Applause.] An appeal should be taken to the courts. It cannot be that these monstrous crimes are beyond their jurisdiction. It has already been held by a judge that an Indian has some standing in court, and others learned in the law believe that the federal courts will decide to the same effect. If this view shall prevail, the power of the ring is broken [applause], this Indian question is solved, and the shield of the law will cover the red man so that his rights will be as well protected as if he were a citizen. [Applause.] My judgment is, that, to settle this question as it should be, he should be made a citizen. But if the courts shall decide that the Indian is not entitled to the protection of their process, he is then completely defenceless, and his fate will be oppression and persecution in the future as in the past, without redress. This meeting has been called for the consideration of such measures as may be taken to obtain a hearing for the Indian in the United States courts.

Mr. Tibbles' Story.

Mayor Prince then introduced Mr. T. H. Tibbles, of Omaha, who told his story very much as already published in the Advertiser. He said he made no attack on the administration. If the angel Gabriel were President of the United States, and should choose his cabinet from the courts of heaven, under the present policy he could not prevent the wrongs. It is the system which Mr. Tibbles said he is fighting. As direct attacks had been made upon him and others connected with the effort to give the Indians standing in the courts, and the charge made that the movement is simply to get money for private use, Mr. Tibbles read the very strong and sufficient indorsements he has from eminent men in the East and in Nebraska. His story was told with much earnestness, and the hall rang with long applause as he repeated Judge Dundy's declaration, "Any human being that God ever made can come into my court." He replied to the statement of the Indian Department officials, that the Poncas were healthy and contented, by citing a fact from the official report, that some of them had been in the guard-house, and that many of them had died recently. He also charged the grossest thieving in connection with the appropriations for the Poncas, and said that all there is to show for $160,000 is six little board shanties, ten by twelve feet, with gaping cracks. He said that if the rights of Indians before the courts were established, there would be a chance to protect them by sending to the penitentiary the scoundrels who steal their property. He closed with an appeal for help for the Poncas.

The Resolutions.

Mr. B. W. Williams then read the following resolutions, which were written by the Rev. E. E. Hale: Resolved, That our fellow-citizens of the Indian tribes have some rights which a white man is bound to respect.

Resolved, That their rights should be finally determined by a decision of the Supreme Court.

Resolved, That to obtain such a decision we believe it desirable to press the appeal of the Ponca Indians, that it may be received by the full bench at Washington.

Resolved, That a committee of ten persons be appointed to take in hand at once the collection of $4000 for this purpose.

The Closing Speeches.

After the reading of the resolutions, Mr. Charles W. Slack was introduced. He said he was well acquainted with Secretary Schurz, who has the Indian bureau in his control. He has been fighting all kinds of rings and all sorts of wrongs, and we may all be satisfied, said Mr. Slack, that he has not a pulsation of the heart which is not in favor of justice, humanity, and the rights of all men. Mr. Slack also complimented highly Mr. A. C. Barstow, of Providence, Chairman of the Board of Indian Commissioners, and said he would gladly right any wrong he can. Mr. Slack also spoke at length upon the evils of race prejudice and the wrongs done to the Poncas.

He was followed by Mr. Thomas J. Gargan, who also made an eloquent plea for protection of law for the Indians, and cited the inconsistency and injustice of such movements as the native American in Know-Nothing times. He implied in his speech that the railroads might be at the bottom of much Indian trouble.

Just before the speech of Wendell Phillips, who was the last speaker, a collection was taken. It was announced that the proprietors of the building had given the use of the hall, and that there were to be no lawyers' fees in connection with the suit, the counsel giving his services. Mr. Tibbles told the story of the Indians selling their ponies to raise money to carry on the suit. The contribution amounted to $140, of which $100 was in one gift.

Mr. Phillips' speech arraigned boldly the Indian policy of the government from the beginning to the present, and contrasted it with the method pursued in Canada, under which no Indian outbreak has ever occurred. Desire of money is the cause of Indian outbreaks. Contractors and merchants with flour or clothing to sell know that when a regiment is out on the plains prices will be much higher; so they scheme to have troops ordered to the remote frontier. In an extreme case which Mr. Phillips cited, flour reached $80 a barrel. He related several instances of atrocious cruelty practiced by the Indian ring upon the unfortunate red men, and made the savages appear as models of Christian forbearance and forgiveness compared with the blood-thirsty and unscrupulous whites. The Indians are two-thirds of the way toward civilization, he said, and they should have the protection of the courts in order that their acquisition of houses, schools, churches, farms, and stock may be defended. Mr. Phillips also cited cases of great financial corruption in the Indian Department, but the facts have been before the public already. The audience gave liberal applause through the long speech, and every praise of the Indian or censure of the ring was evidently relished.

At the end of his address the resolutions were adopted unanimously, and the previous committee of five was authorized to appoint the ten to raise the $4000. They are Mr. B. W. Williams, the Rev. E. E. Hale, Mr. B. P. Smith, the Rev. William Bradley, and the Hon. Charles E. Ladd, who will publish the names of the committee in the daily papers. The Rev. Dr. Lothrop will act as treasurer for the fund.—Boston Advertiser, August 6.

A LARGE TERRESTRIAL GLOBE.

A New York artificer, Grube, has constructed what purports to be the largest globe of the earth now in existence, showing all the prominent features of its surface. Its diameter is four feet and about one inch, the scale being one to ten million. The range of even the Himalayas would not be visible upon this globe if the same scale were adopted for the elevations as for the map, and accordingly the relief is made upon a scale which exaggerates heights twenty times. The oceans, seas, and rivers are colored blue; the continents are yellow; the glaciers, ice-bergs, and floating cakes of ice, white. Plains and mountain-ranges are clearly shown, and every part of the world is exhibited in its true character. Red, black, and white lines cross the globe to indicate the isothermal belts, the variations of the magnetic needle, the date-line where ships correct their logs by skipping from Saturday to Monday, and vice versa, and other facts of like character. The map has been corrected in the light of the latest discoveries. The northern coast of Siberia has been much altered in the atlases by the Nordenskjöld expedition, the ships sailing in deep water over places marked as five hundred miles inland, and being compelled to go hundreds of miles around promontories, etc., which are occupied on the maps by bodies of water; the relief is formed by wax. Mr. Grube has been two years in perfecting his globe.—Popular Science Monthly.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM IN RUSSIA.

For many years past, no bull or encyclical of the Pope has been permitted to be published in the Polish provinces of Russia, which are inhabited by Roman Catholics. The alleged ground of prohibition was that among Polish revolutionists who took up arms against the Russian Government in 1863 were many Catholic priests, and that these priests were encouraged in the revolt by Pius IX. When the Polish insurrection was crushed, the Pope was forbidden direct communication with the Poles. But times and circumstances have now changed, and the Czar himself, with his government, is endangered. Negotiations were opened some time ago between the Court of St. Petersburg and the Vatican, and the result has been a restoration of the friendly relations between the Czar and the Pope. Now the Catholics of Poland do not need to secure the aid of smugglers, as they had to do in past years. The privileges of the Vatican were restored, upon the condition that the clergy under its control should denounce the projects of the Nihilists as opposed to the State and to religion. There has lately been published in the Gazeta Polska, and republished in the other Polish journals, an epistle of the Archbishop Sotkevitch, of Warsaw, to the clergy of his diocese, transmitting to each of them a copy of the encyclical of the Holy Father, Leo XIII., dated December 28, 1878. The archbishop says that this most worthy and important document should be known, not only to the clergy, but also to the faithful laity, who should be informed of its contents, and thus protected from the dangerous influence of pernicious doctrines. Further, the priests are advised to expound from the Holy Scriptures the rights of property, the family question, the proper relations of obedience to the authorities. The publication of the epistle of Archbishop Sotkevitch was greeted by the Russian secular journals as the triumph of religious toleration, and the Golos said: "Religious toleration, always and everywhere, is the surest sign of moral development, and of political and national growth; and for this reason we welcome the publication of the Papal Encyclical in Russia." But the Russian religious organs regret the new policy of the Czar, who is the head of the Orthodox Church, in granting privileges to the Church of Rome, which is the powerful competitor of Russian Orthodoxy. In consequence of their language on this subject, some of the religious journals have lately received official warning.—Ottawa Herald.

PROGRESS.

The author of a series of papers on "Young London," in The Telegraph (London), records some of the changes of the half-century. When he first began to remember things, there were only two railroads in the united kingdom. It took the best part of four days to get to Paris; and the postage of a letter to that city was one and eightpence. There were no ocean steamers; and five weeks were often consumed in a journey to New York. There were no lucifer matches lighting on or off the box; and flint and steel and the tinder-box, and matches dipped in brimstone, reigned supreme in the kitchen; oil was still burnt in the street-lamps of Grosvenor Square. There were no electric telegraphs, no post-office money-orders, no steel pens,—in common use,—no envelopes, no perambulators. There were no cheap newspapers, no shilling magazines, no post-cards, no perforated stamps and counterfoils, and no paraffin candles. There was not a hotel in England where a lady could dine in a public room. There were only two decent French restaurants in London. There was no photography, no benzoline, no chloroform, no glycerine, no collodion, and no gun cotton. There were no mauve and no magenta dyes. There were no preserved meats, soups, or vegetables. There was but little chocolate and no cocoa. Soda water was a shilling a bottle. There were no Hansom cabs and no knifeboards to the omnibuses. There were no refrigerators and no sewing-machines. There were no keyless nor crystal-cased watches; no Albert or Breguet watch chains; no electro-gilding nor silvering, and no electrotyping. The steel fork in ordinary use had only two prongs; "balanced" table-knives were unknown. There were no staves that were not instruments of torture, and no walking-boots for ladies. There was no Balbriggan nor Balmoral hosiery. There were only a few velocipedes, and there were no revolvers. There was no gutta-percha, and very few cigars.—N. Y. Tribune.

FOREIGN.

SNOW FELL LAST month in Dauphiny, France.

LAKE LEMAN ROSE recently twenty inches in twenty-four hours. Only three times since 1792 has it reached so high a level.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY has invited the Bishop of London (in accordance with a request from Convocation) to direct his attention to "the necessity of prayer being offered to Almighty God for such weather as may enable our people to gather in an abundant harvest."

IT IS FEARED that there will be severe famine next year in Zululand, as it is now seed-time and no land is being sown, while much seed has been destroyed and many cattle seized. General Wolseley has no intention of pursuing Cetwayo with British troops, as the nature of the country renders such a course impracticable. His policy rather is to stir up the neighboring tribes against him.

AN ASSOCIATION has been formed in England with the designation of the "Gospel Vindicating Council." Its object is announced to be "to refute on scientific and philosophic grounds the attacks that modern infidelity, in its scientific speculations, is from time to time directing, not merely against the Christ of the creeds, but against the Christ of the Gospel,—the Christ supremely loved by all good men, (I) and the grand hope of humanity."

BY ORDER of Prince Dolgouorkoff, Governor-General of Moscow, all the usurers and pawnbrokers of that city, two hundred and seventy-eight in number, have been summarily expelled. The day after the order, the Governor-General visited their dwellings in person, in order to ascertain for himself that none remained behind. The ejected people were accompanied out of the city by the military and an immense crowd of spectators. It is said that the lamentations of these outcasts were perfectly heart-rending.

THE REV. JOHN HUNTER, a Congregationalist minister of York, has written a letter to the York Herald "publicly protesting against the step taken by the clergy of York in preventing the delivery of Mr. Bradlaugh's intended lecture in York last Monday evening." He says: "I write from a strong sense of duty, and at the risk of having my interference in this matter misunderstood; but believing as I do that the cause of religion cannot be promoted, but must in the long run suffer, from modes of defending it that are not in harmony with freedom and justice, I feel that I should be acting a very cowardly part to remain silent."

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES patronize performances for the benefit of French and Italian sufferers. They would do well to remember the old maxim, "Charity begins at home." The storms which have swept over Portadown, Ireland, have submerged thousands of acres of wheat, corn, potatoes, and hay, several townlands are inundated. From Portadown bridge, a vast unbroken sheet of water extends for fifteen miles. In Suffolk, the People's Hall and many houses and gardens are under water. At Ipswich the roads are flooded to the greatest depth ever known. At Halesworth the water is four feet deep, and the shops and houses are submerged.—National Reformer.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Echo states that the funeral of a poor person "just beyond Hounslow" was delayed an hour last week because the vicar who was to officiate "was engaged at a cricket match then being played with a team from Egham." The chief mourner, "having an engagement in London, was compelled to leave ere the funeral rites were performed." Doubtless the friends of the deceased were greatly annoyed at the delay; but what, we ask, are the feelings of such persons in comparison with the enjoyment of one of "the Lord's anointed" servants? Whether they refuse to read over a coffin, or choose to delay the ceremony, the laity are wholly at the mercy of the "successors of the apostles." While people attach an exaggerated importance to the ministrations of men in white surplices, they must expect to find the latter now and then doing what Paul called "magnifying his office."

JESTINGS.

DARKNESS that may be felt—a black hat.—Walden Observer.

A FARMER was killed by his hired man, and the coroner's verdict was "death by his own hand."

"WHAT MISERABLE little eggs again! Take 'em out, Jane, and let the hen set on 'em a little longer!"—N. Y. Tribune.

MISS CHALKER AND MR. WATERMAN, of Cheshire, were married recently. They intend to go into the milk business.— Jewish Times.

IT WAS A Trojan lady, a niece of Mrs. Veneering and a cousin of Mrs. Shoddy, who invited a friend to come around and see her new horse and phantom.—Albany Journal.

"BRILLIANT and impulsive people," said a lecturer on physiognomy, "have black eyes, or if they don't have 'em they're apt to get 'em, if they're too impulsive."—Ottawa Herald.

WE ARE requested by the publishers of Mr. Benson's Fifteen Years in Hell to read and give the book a good notice. Not this weather, if the court knows itself, and it thinks it does.—Bangor Commercial.

A GEORGIA NEGRO, who bet ten dollars that General Washington commanded the Federals at Bull Run, handed the money over, with the remark: "Well, dis yere hist'ry business is all mixed up, any way."

HIBERNIAN WIT.—Phelim (to tourist who has taken shelter in a leaky shebeen): "'Dad and its soaked to the bone you'll be gotten' wid the strathme through the roof. Come outside, sorr,—it's dryer in the wet!"—Funny Folks.

COUNTRY DOCTOR to the bereaved widow of a late member of the Georgia Legislature: "I cannot tell how pained I was to hear that your husband had gone to heaven. We were bosom friends, but now we shall never meet again."—Cambridge Tribune.

ANALYSIS.—Lady: "Why did you leave your last place?" Cook: "Timper, m'um." Lady: "Temper! But when I'm put out myself, I show that I'm annoyed." Cook: "Oh, I don't mind a m'roose timper, m'um,—a revingful timper I likes; but a timper as goes a nagnagnaggin' mornin', noon, and night won't do with me?"—Punch.

CHEMISTRY has done wonders in science, but no pen can depict its force, its beauty, or its usefulness; and it has made miraculous provisions for the spelling-schools of the future, but no tongue will ever be able to "set 'em up," for the true professor now talks of "ethoxilohenypropylformate of paratonillendiamin." A little exercise with the Marsh apparatus will be necessary on these words to assure one there is no poison in them.—Norwich Bulletin.

WILD JIM, a Kansas desperado, thus argued in justification of his latest murder: "He'd a shot me if I hadn't a shot him. Do you expect a man to take a risk when he's got a shootin' iron in his grip? I didn't care about his dyin', but I sure pop didn't want to die myself. Maybe he wouldn't a shot me, after all; but I hadn't no call to wait and see. In the present disorganized state of society in Kansas, 'tain't no man's duty to s'pose another man's intentions is good."

A NOBLEMAN was fond of amusing his invited guests with frightful lies. If those present disbelieved him, he was wont to turn to his servant standing behind his chair, with the words, "Is not that true, John?" and the servant lied still more earnestly to confirm his master's statements. One day, the Baron related to his guests that he had once shot a stag with the same shot in the right foot and behind the right ear. "Impossible!" was the unanimous verdict of those present. "Is not that true, John?" said the master to his servant. "Yes, indeed," replied John, with the greatest composure; "but the stag was scratching his ear with his foot." That night when John had assisted his master to bed he lingered a moment, saying, "Gracious master, I have a request to make." "What is it, John?" "Do not let your lies be so impossible. I had hard work to-day to make both ends meet."—German exchange.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or reading article, which alone is worth the price of the year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." and later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

LIBERAL LEAGUE PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution; including the equitable taxation of church property, secularisation of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights; to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

W. E.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

SIFTINGS.

A RELIGIOUS riot in Ireland is announced.

THE RITUALISTS in England propose to found an "order of widows."

THE SUMMER School of Philosophy closed its first session last Saturday. It has proved a gratifying success.

SOME ONE in writing from Concord, says, "The crows and vultures of modern materialism, who study physiology and psychology over the same corpses by their native and repulsive analyses," did not attend. The Sunday School Times pronounces the above a "clever descriptive phrase." That depends on the definition of clever.

A LITTLE four-year-old in Florence was watching his mother get dinner the other day, when he said, to her solemnly, "I wish you didn't been born!" "Why, Dicky?" said the mother. "Because you don't give me anything good to eat when I want it." "Well, Dicky, where would you be, if mamma hadn't been born?" "Oh, in Springfield, I guess; or else in town."

AMONG NOTABLE summer schools for adults this season are those of botany and chemistry in connection with Harvard College. The botany school is in charge of Prof. George L. Goodale, with thirty-four pupils, the majority of whom are women. The school of chemistry is under the direction of Mr. Mayberry, with twenty-five pupils. The term of each will continue six weeks.

THE LONDON Academy states that the delegates of the Clarendon Press have already begun printing three more volumes of "The Sacred Books of the East," edited by Prof. Max Müller. These are the Vendidad, translated by James Darmesteter; The Bundahis, translated by Dr. E. W. West, and The Bhagavad-gita, translated by K. T. Telang. They will appear in the course of next year.

ONE OF THE last to speak out in favor of coeducation is President Barnard, of Columbia College. As Columbia has been regarded one of the slowest of the more noted collegiate institutions of the country to move in the way of innovation, and President Barnard occupies a very eminent position among our educators, the acquisition adds a good deal of strength to the side he has espoused.

JOHN BROWN, JR., who has been investigating the condition of the colored refugees from the Southern States, writes: "All the testimony shows that the cause of the exodus was a condition of increasing poverty, distrust, and constant fear, with no hope of its becoming better for themselves or their children; but, instead, the conviction was forced upon them, that absolute slavery was to be the fate of those who did not go away."

A GOOD DEAL of a sensation was produced in the French Chambers during the discussion of the Ferry Educational Bill. M. Ferry introduced some quotations from the text-books which were in use in some of the leading Catholic institutions. They were found to be full of praise of feudal times, of the Inquisition, justification of the Edict of Nantes, and like Roman Catholic inhumanities, with denunciation of the struggles of the people for liberty. A Contemporaneous History inculcates submission of the State to the Church, calls civil marriage a species of legal concubinage, and religious toleration a nécessité de circonstance, a sign of lessening authority.

IF WE WERE a Spiritualist we should want to be a subscriber to the Religio-Philosophical Journal of Chicago. Even without being one, we do not hesitate to say that we regard it exceedingly interesting and ably conducted. Its original contributions, while they are inclined to take much higher flights than we can follow, and range amid spheres and spirits and eternities, retain as a general rule a closer contact with terrestrial things than the average Spiritualist is wont to. Its editorials are vigorous and independent, and its selections from exchanges equal to the best we meet. Although a strenuous defender of Spiritualism, it claims to seek to subject the "phenomena" to the tests of science, and to rid the movement of the various species of imposture with which it has been somewhat associated. Its price has been recently reduced.

FATHER HECKER declares that the name New England is destined at no very distant day to be more appropriately designated New Ireland. The foreign is rapidly outstripping the native population. He cites the registration report of Massachusetts, for 1870, which says: "The character of our population is undergoing a great change. Surely and not slowly a mixed stock of Irish, German, and Canadians is taking the place of the pure English stock which has possessed Massachusetts for more than two centuries." This is further confirmed by the birth rate: "The 1,238,008 native-born inhabitants of Massachusetts produced 16,897 children in 1877, while the 418,904 foreign-born inhabitants produced 18,071 children in the same period. The births among the latter, therefore, occurred in the ratio of 43 to 1,000 of population, while among the former they occurred in the ratio of less than 14 per 1,000."

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, to whom were entrusted the care of the Winnebago Indians, are prepared to give a very encouraging report of the results of their experiment. It is stated that these Indians have advanced so rapidly from nomadic habits to those of civilized life, that it will be only a few years before the tribe will be independent of the government. During the past year, it has been self-supporting, with the exception of three pounds of flour given weekly to each parent whose children attended school. The tribe has at present a surplus of farm products for sale, and its condition is very promising. Ten years ago, rations were issued to the tribe at a cost of about $30,000 a year, and they had only three hundred acres of land under cultivation: now they have two thousand five hundred acres. And yet these are the people for whom General Sheridan, and some others who offer advice to the government, can see no better use than to kill them.

SOME WEEKS ago, there was a curious marriage in Worcester. Henry J. Munson, an Advent preacher, at the close of one of his services summoned Mattie A. Eaton, with whom he had but a short acquaintance, to the altar and proclaimed her his wife. The proceeding appears to have been a surprise to those present, and did not wholly meet with the favor of the brethren. Indeed, it is said a division followed in the church in consequence. In addition to this, the marriage was pronounced illegal, and upon examination Mr. Munson was held in $500 for appearance before the Superior Court of Worcester the present month. His original mode of conduct was further shown on the latter occasion. He insisted upon opening the court with prayer, attempted to expound the statutes to the judge, and, when decision was rendered, refused to go to jail, and could only be got there by being carried like so much inanimate matter. When his "wife" and her sister (and their cousins and aunts, perhaps) endeavored to induce him to go and get married according to the law, he refused, saying, "No, no! I won't do it! I won't do wrong! You get some of this grace of God in your heart, and you will see it is right. The Lord will bring us out all right. Let the devil do his work: his time is short. I tell you, the devil is at the bottom of all this. The Lord will take care of this matter, and all their works will yet be turned into confusion."

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

Industrial Equity.

A DISCOURSE BEFORE THE FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF PROVIDENCE, R.I.

BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

The interests involved, friends, in the problem to which I am about to call your attention, are at once so various and so serious, that discussion of them often arouses ill-feeling on both sides. The parties to the controversy are naturally sensitive, and have frequently indulged in language toward each other such as the thoughtful and judicial mind must condemn. I have sought in dealing with this question, and I hope not altogether in vain, to cast aside all prejudices if I have any, and to ask, not what do the interests of labor require, not what do the interests of capital require, but what does humanity require, what does equity require? And now, friends, I want to ask you to listen in the same spirit. Let us forget for the moment our outward conditions, let us forget if possible our own selfish interests one way or the other, and let us, in the spirit of candor and of justice, examine into the present conditions of labor, see if there is anything unfair or unjust in them, and if we find anything which is not as we think it should be, let us, with calm and yet determined purpose, seek and apply the remedy.

One thing more: let us remember that we are all in the same boat; that if there is any injustice in the present relations of labor and capital, it is one which grows out of the existing state of development of mankind, for which there are numerous causes, but for which no single individual or class of individuals can be held responsible. An injustice may be caused in one of two ways, or by a combination of both. It may be the result of personal interference, as for example when a large man or nation deliberately attempts to compel a small man or nation to do what he or it has no right to have done, and would not think of asking of an equal in strength. This, of course, requires direct force to accomplish it. It is the rule of muscle, and is temporary and limited in its nature. The other and more universal cause of injustice lies in the imperfect development of mankind, in the fact that in the progress of the world men have not yet become wise enough to live together equitably. This is a difficulty inherent in the system. The world has grown out of like difficulties, it will grow out of this difficulty,—grow out: it cannot be forced out. If a man undertakes to steal Mexico or Santo Domingo you can seize him if you choose; but you cannot put a system, a state of civilization, in the lockup. You cannot deal with it by heroic methods. It is one thing to deal with individual evil: it is another and very different thing to deal with social evil. True, it is hard to say where individual responsibility begins and where it ends; but it does have a beginning and it does have an ending. There are many sins a man commits which he can help if he will at once. There are many sins which the system under which we live at any given time permits, which no man can help at once. If, therefore, there be anything wrong in the condition of labor at any time, the capitalist is not necessarily responsible for it. He may be, and generally is, as much a result of the system as the laborer himself. Many capitalists are cold and selfish, many lose their own souls in gaining the wealth they worship; but even where some great soul maintains itself in spite of the influences of a large fortune, it is as powerless to change the conditions as the poorest of us. It may take a parental interest in its employees, it may do much to ameliorate the hardship of their lot. I know some great souls who do just that thing,—they are bright examples of the divine in the human; but if we expect anything more than this of the wealthy employer, we expect more than in the nature of things it is possible for him to do. The only way to improve our industrial system, if it needs improving, is for all thoughtful persons, whether capitalists or laborers, to apply themselves to the study of equity, and to seek its gradual but sure incorporation into human institutions and laws.

Distinctly recognizing these points, I think we are prepared to meet in an impartial and humane spirit the preliminary question: do the present relations between capital and labor result in equity, and if not, wherein not? For example, a small minority of men control our large manufacturing and transporting corporations, and a large majority man and run them under the supervision of this minority. The managers work less hours than the managed, and not more faithfully; and yet as the result, as a rule, the former have all the necessities, most of the comforts, many of the luxuries of life, while the latter, as a rule, have none of the luxuries, few of the comforts, and not all the necessities of healthy existence. Is that equity?

Mr. A. goes into the manufacture of coats, employing fifty women. He puts in the capital, manages the business, and frequently makes a fortune; they put in their labor, receive starvation wages, and unless they have other means of income always die poor. Is that equity?

Our industrial system, just in proportion to what is popularly termed its success, results in the mansions of wealth and the hovels of poverty side by side. They are, taken together, its natural fruit. Is that equity?

What is equity? According to Webster, it is "justice, impartiality, the giving or desiring to give to each man his due," etc. But what is each man's due? The answers to that question differ in different ages. The king would say, To be my willing and obedient subject. Religion, and democratic institutions which aim to embody practical religion in the government of men, say, An opportunity to earn an honest and comfortable subsistence for himself and family, and to make the most possible of his faculties and theirs. Plainly, if this be equity,—and who will deny it?—we are still far from an equitable standard.

It is a conclusion reached not only by laboring men but forced upon thinking men of all classes, that there is something radically defective in an industrial system which turns out as its natural product so much abject poverty. The terrible inequalities of life are not pleasant to contemplate; and honest, fair-minded persons of all degrees of wealth and intelligence are thinking, if not saying, as much. All that is needed to place the really broad and cultured minds among capitalists, as well as among workmen, in the proper mood for attacking and solving this problem is to dispel utterly and forever the idea that to admit the evil, or to strive to remedy it, is to condemn persons. Such action would be simply a recognition of the evils of our system of industry; and the time will come when, with that point in view, men and women will be praised or criticized, not according to their wealth or poverty, but according to the disposition they show to help or to retard the coming of a better order of things.

We have, then, our starting point. Our system results in poverty for the many, extreme wealth for the few. It is wanting, therefore, in that essential equity which is the heart of the democratic principle. To study the causes which have produced this result, and to bring about if possible such a change in them as shall result in equity, must be therefore the object of the true labor-movement. How is this to be done, or, in other words, what is specifically the reform needed? Let me answer that question by first showing what it is not. In the first place, let me say it is not a financial reform; that is to say, it does not, as it seems to me, deal directly with what are called financial questions. The true currency; interest—what rate shall be allowed, if any; rent—is it a legitimate source of income; profits—are they permissible?—these are matters of importance; but they form a question or questions entirely distinct from that we are striving to consider. They are of immediate concern to the capitalist; they are not of the most immediate concern to the honest laborer, who is quite willing to pay for what he gets. The laborer's question is not, Upon what shall the currency be based? but, Whatever be its basis, shall I have my fair share of it? It is not, What rate, if any, shall I pay the capitalist for the use of his money? It is, Shall I be relieved from the necessity of using his money by having enough of my own? It is not, Shall I pay a rent for living in another man's house? It is, Shall I live in my own house? It is not, Shall I pay some one a profit? It is, Shall I have the money to pay a profit with? The character and volume of the currency, interest on money, rent, and profits,—these are all questions of finance, upon some of which the doctors all but hopelessly disagree. The question at issue concerning capital and labor is an industrial one, always greatly simplified if kept upon an industrial basis.

Neither can any permanent good be gained, as has been claimed, by diminishing production. The capitalist, from the narrow outlook of his counting-room, as he counts the cases of boots for which there is no demand, says there is a glut in the market, and proceeds to expound the political economy of trade. There has been, he claims, an overproduction of boots. But while he talks, there are in all our cities hundreds and thousands of little bare feet suffering to be shod. Until these are covered, there can be no such thing as an overproduction of shoes. Underconsumption is the real difficulty. The same remark holds true of clothing, flour, and indeed of all the articles required in sustaining and protecting life. So long as men are underfed and underclothed, so long as any need and are unable to obtain a given article of manufacture, the cause of poor sales is found in underconsumption, and it is in the highest degree incorrect to talk about overproduction. To reduce the supply when the larger portion of mankind are but scantily furnished, is suicidal.

Neither can the root of our industrial evils be reached through free trade. A recent writer on this subject argues that nothing will ease the depressed condition of labor but the abolition of the tariff. This, he says, will reduce the price of imported goods, and so bring them within reach of the laborer. But that is beginning at the wrong end. As has been well said, it matters not how cheap goods are; if the people have no money with which to purchase, bringing to this country, however freely, the products of another will not give them the means of purchasing. The arguments in favor of free trade are unanswerable, but they have little to do with our present problem. There is, of course, a sense in which it may be said every reform is connected with every other; but for practical purposes, especially where the treatment of intricate questions is concerned, it is of the first importance to simplify the terms. In no other way can a solution be reached. In this process of simplification, it becomes necessary to brush aside all extraneous issues, however good in themselves; and free trade is certainly one of these.

If rational reform in the conditions of labor cannot touch financial issues or accept the theory of overproduction or become the special champion of free trade, still less can it rally under the cry, "Property is robbery," and so seek its abolition. To say that a man has, or a set of men have and can have, no right to the things of this world which shall result in excluding other men from any right therein, is, I believe, true. But to say there can be no such thing as property in the ordinary acceptance of the term, to say that a man has no right, no absolute right, to such portion of air as his lungs require, and pure at that, to as much food and drink as shall sustain life in good healthy condition, and to at least as much land as is needed for a habitation, is like saying he has no right to life itself. The whole discussion concerning the right of property as carried on by Proudhon and his followers is, may I say, of a metaphysical and impracticable nature. I allude to it here, not for the purpose of claiming that the views these gentlemen hold may not some day prove correct, nor for objecting to the discussion itself, but simply to draw the line between it and the agitation for real reform in the relations between capital and labor. The rights and duties of the two parties to this relation present a practical question directly and immediately concerning the welfare of both. I venture to think it ought to be settled, and will be settled, long before we are prepared to discuss wisely, much less to follow implicitly, M. Proudhon.

If, then, the labor question is not one of finance, of overproduction, of free trade, of the abolition of property, what is it? Simply one of distribution. The present distribution of wealth is inequitable. How shall an equitable distribution be secured? In other words, how shall we reach such a civilization as will melt the fact of poverty and its counterpart fact of extreme wealth out of existence? Rational labor-reform should seek to solve that problem and no other. Not, How shall more wealth be produced? but, How shall we secure an equitable distribution of such as is produced? Not, How shall the poor live? but, How shall there cease to be any poor to live?—these are the questions confronting the civilization of the century. In order to answer them, we must learn the art of just distribution. Let us begin with a definition of terms. What do we mean by labor, wealth, capital?

By labor, we mean every effort which produces anything, or adds to the value or usefulness of anything already produced. For example, Nature furnishes the farmer with land. He clears it of stumps and stones, ploughs and harrows it, and plants and tends his crops upon it. He has produced value; that is, he has rendered useful to mankind what was before useless. The farmer, then, is a productive laborer. Any one can see that.

The miner wrenches from Nature the silver or iron ore, and the inventor and mechanic convert the one into a spoon and the other into a steam-engine. These are all productive laborers, then, because they have together utilized the crude silver and iron. The miner cannot say, I did it; the inventor cannot say, I did it; the mechanic cannot say, I did it. Neither did it alone, neither could possibly have accomplished the result without the help of the other two.

Now suppose the miner to be in California and the inventor and mechanic in Boston: it is evident that the common carrier comes in as a necessity, and that his transportation of the crude ore from the mining to the manufacturing district increases its usefulness, or, as we say, adds to its utility or value. He therefore is rightfully ranked among productive laborers, and the fact that at a given time and place there may be too many common carriers and go-between does not alter the productive character of the legitimate carrying trade.

In general terms, it may be said no material occupation of man can be ruled out of the class of productive labor, save where it has no part in increasing in any way the usefulness of that which would exist without it. But the term labor covers much more than the material workers. It includes the thinkers. The philosopher, the reformer, the religious leader, the inventor, as we have already seen,—any man who contributes something to the world of thought,—is a productive laborer. Indeed, the labor of the hands is valuable just in proportion as it is guided by labor of the brain. Thought precedes action, and is often its superior. "All we are," says Buddha, "is the result of what we have thought, it is founded on our thoughts, it is made up of our thoughts." I quite agree with a modern writer, that all labor which is not the product of thought sows the seeds of poverty. The idea held by many, that the material workers, the workers in and on merchandises, are the only productive laborers, at all events the only laborers to be considered in a study of this question, would be impossible in a system where anything like equity prevailed. By the term labor, then, we mean that effort which produces anything, either in the world of matter or of thought, or adds to the value or increases the utility of anything already produced.

The term wealth is used as indirectly indicating houses, lands, pictures, books, etc., and directly the medium of exchange, the dollar, which represents the ability to procure these.

By capital is meant not brains, which are in a sense the writer's capital, nor the ability to do any particular thing, which is in a sense the capital of its possessor, but simply accumulated wealth. We have, then, three factors in the problem,—the laborer producing utilities; wealth, that which represents the ability to procure the utilities produced; and the capitalist who accumulates this wealth. The laborers are a very large majority of mankind, and do the real work of the world. The capitalists are a small minority, but, through certain qualities of brain power and these not of the highest, largely control the labor and hold the wealth. That some laborers secure wealth and that most capitalists labor, is not denied; but it is claimed that, as a rule, labor and capital are not sufficiently combined in the same person; that the productive laborers get less and the shrewd managers and capitalists more of the world's wealth than belongs to them; that whether there is wealth enough, and in the development of natural resources always likely to be enough, is not the question; that the legitimate inquiry, and the only legitimate inquiry, is the one already suggested,—Why this inequitable distribution of wealth, and how can an equitable distribution be secured?

Now if in pursuing this inquiry we seek for a fact so general as to be well-nigh universal, we shall strike at once the centre of our present industrial order; viz., the wage-system. This system appears in the natural progress of ideas wherever men are on the high road to civilization. It is the system into which we are all born, under which we all live. It is the channel through which the mass of mankind receive what comes to them of the world's wealth. It is at once evident, including as it does all who receive salaries as well as what are commonly termed wages (for whether under one name or the other, the principle involved is precisely the same),—it is at once evident that this system must be very fully and directly involved in the present social and industrial conditions. That is to say, precisely as we hold the monarchical principle responsible for certain characteristics of mankind always found where it prevails, so we may claim that the inequalities and hardships of our present industrial form are the natural result of the wage-system. If this be so,—and all evolutionists may readily perceive it,—then it becomes equally evident that a necessary step in the direction of equity is the abolition of the wage-system; not to-day, not to-morrow, not next year, not all at once at any time, but by the slow but sure process of natural growth and development. If we dig deep enough, we can follow the roots of this system back to the primitive condition of the human race. Wage-slavery,—for that is what it is,—wage-slavery is an ameliorated form of chattel-slavery. Both were barbarous in their origin. Now that one of them has gone down in night, we freely admit its barbarity. But what made it barbarous? Not alone that it sundered the family and outraged woman. These were its inevitable, though not universal, accompaniments. Chattel slavery was barbarous because it did not allow a man the results of his own labor; because it held him subject to the authority of another, who was privileged to pocket the fruits of his toil. Had the person of woman remained unviolated, and had the family relation been sacredly preserved, still, with this characteristic, slavery would have been and was barbarous. It is precisely so, only in a milder way, with the wage-system. Mr. Sumner said the slave is held simply for the use of his master. The essential spirit of the wage-system asserts that all labor is simply for the use of capital.

Mr. Sumner said slavery closes the gates of knowledge. The wage-system largely deprives its subjects of the means for opening them.

Mr. Sumner said slavery appropriates all the toil of its victims. The wage system differs from it only in this, that while slavery cared for them in an animal way merely, as it would for horses and cows, it (the wage-system) returns them enough from the proceeds of the labor which it has taken to keep them from bodily starvation.

The celebrated remark of Mr. Jefferson Davis, that slavery is but a form of civil government for those who are not fit to govern themselves, is quite akin to the somewhat prevalent idea that the wage-system is a form of government for labor which as a rule is not able to govern itself. Dickens makes Pancks, the collector of rents, etc., in Little Dorrit, express the same thought.

"What's a man made for?" says Pancks. "That's what I ask our weekly tenants. Some of 'em will pull long faces to me, and say, 'Poor as you see us, master, we're always grinding, drudging, toiling every minute we're awake.' I say to them, What else are you made for? It shuts them up. They haven't a word to answer. What else are you made for? That clinches it."

Does that clinch it, Mr. Pancks? Does that clinch it, men and women who have brains to think and hearts to feel? Does it never occur to you, that these grinding, drudging toilers, just as much as you and I, are made to think, to love, to grow?

Mill says in his Political Economy, in considering the remedies for low wages: "If the bulk of the human race are always to remain as at present, slaves to toil in which they have no interest, and therefore feel no interest; drudging from early morn till late at night for bare necessities, and with all the intellectual and moral deficiencies which that implies; without resources either in mind or feelings; untought, for they cannot be better taught than fed; selfish, for all their thoughts are required for themselves; without interests or sentiments as citizens and members of society, and with a sense of injustice rankling in their minds, equally for what they have not and for what others have,—I know not what there is which should make a person with any capacity of reason concern himself about the destinies of the human race." It was written wisely long ago:—

Makes man a slave takes half his worth away";

and it is just as true of mental and moral as of physical slavery. To make mental and moral progress impossible for all but the exceptionally strong and gifted, is to create mental and moral slavery, and so to take away from man half his real worth. The wage-system does that. It makes man a slave to the necessity of using all his energies in securing a bare subsistence for his family. He is compelled to spend all his strength, not in living, but in obtaining the means to live; and when the Pancks of this world say that is the chief end of man, and just what he is made for, they proclaim the worst kind of materialism and infidelity upon which the sun shines. The truth is, we are living to-day under an aristocratic organization of society. America has been evolved out of, and has thrown off as the butterfly the grub, the tyranny of kings and priests. She finds herself now in the next stage of progress, subject no longer to an aristocracy of blood or of religion, but of wealth. The form of society under which we live at this hour is practically an aristocracy of wealth.

Herbert Spencer, with his keen perception, sees that, when he says in his chapter on "The Morals of Trade":—

"The great inciter of trading malpractices is intense desire for wealth, and this desire results from the indiscriminate respect paid to wealth."

Col. Higginson has been so impressed with this idea, that he has prepared a lecture upon it, in which he maintains that we are living under an "Aristocracy of the Dollar." No individual is to be praised or condemned for the position in which he finds himself under this aristocracy. I am simply trying to state the fact, and to show its place in the evolution of the idea of liberty. There was a time in the progress of the world when chattel-slavery was the natural outgrowth of the barbarism of the past; and it came, did its work, and has passed on. It was, as Mr. Sumner said, barbarous in its origin and barbarous in its law; and the enlightened conscience, not the sword, which was the final instrument employed, not military necessity, which was simply the opportunity, but the enlightened conscience of a purer civilization, finally threw it off. But no sooner was the chattel-slavery of black labor abolished than we were brought face to face with the wage-slavery of all labor,—the next fact in the line of progress. We have been evolved out of the barbarisms and slavery of the past into the wage-system; but just so surely as the process of evolution is to continue (and to doubt its continuance is to doubt the continued existence of the universe),—just so surely as this process is to continue, we shall in time be evolved out of the wage-system and into something higher and better than itself. What that something shall be, is, to my mind, indirectly indicated by the animating principle in all forms of slavery. Whether under cruel emperors or petty tribal chieftains, whether under kings or parliaments, whether under chattel-slavery or wage-slavery, this principle has been that of competition,—look out for No. One, and let the devil take the hindmost. Where there has been power enough lodged in one man, he has become a despot; in one class of men, they have become an aristocracy. From Caligula to the last Southern slaveholder in America, the principle at bottom governing the conditions which they could not create and did not understand was that of taking advantage of one's neighbor by reason of superior muscle or superior brain power. This same competitive principle is in full force, though less obnoxious in form, in the wage-system. Under the old barbarisms, there was a constant conflict of interests resulting in war and bloodshed. Under the wage-system, there is, in a milder degree, this same conflict still. That is to say, there is an entire lack of that identity of interest which is the first prerequisite of the highest success in all combined effort. As has been said, the interest of the laborer under this system is to get the largest possible amount of pay for the smallest possible amount of work. The interest of the employer is to get the largest possible amount of work for the smallest possible amount of pay. This results as inevitably in conflict as the older system of chattel-slavery did, rendered of course far less gross on both sides by the advances which have been made in civilization and democratic government.

Mr. Mill has plainly seen this difficulty, and has hinted at the remedy. To feel an interest in the wealth it produces, labor must have an interest. In other words, the individual must know that his income will be in just proportion to the amount of labor he invests, or, still otherwise stated, the system which fixes his wages by an arbitrary standard must be replaced by one that will make him a sharer in the profits. Competition, a great unseemly scramble in which each man crowds every other in order that he may come out ahead in the race, must give way to cooperation, the highest exhibition of human brotherhood, in which the interests of all are seen to be the interests of each, and the interests of each are seen to be the interests of all. Now do not turn upon me and say this is a dreamy impossibility; you cannot abolish the one system, still less can you introduce the other. I know that no one can make the change to-day; but I am talking for the future, to the end that I may do my little part, and urge others to do theirs, in helping to shape it. What I claim is this: that, time being given, the system of competition is to be gradually transformed into the system of cooperation.

Now by cooperation I do not mean simply combination. A strike is a combination of laborers against capitalists. So far as there is any conflict, trade-unions are combinations of laborers against capitalists. Both will be more or less approved or condemned according to the features of individual cases as they arise. But they are all combinations of labor only. So are cooperative stores, which, while they have a certain educational value, as do all experiments in partial cooperation, result simply, at their best, in saving a certain per cent. of wages received, but not in securing a larger share of profits earned. They deal with the question, What shall be done with wealth after it is distributed? but we are seeking for a juster method of distribution. What we need in industry is exactly what we claim to have in government. Our ideal republican or democratic form, if you choose so to call it, is the cooperative form. If it is superior to the older monarchical forms, it is because of the cooperative principle which underlies it. Our citizens cooperate in making the laws and in executing them. That is the ideal, and, to a limited extent, the practice with us politically. And now, precisely as in politics, substituting for the religion of enmity the religion of amity gives us a government of the people, for the people, by the people, instead of a race of tyrants and serfs; so in industry, substituting for the religion of enmity the religion of amity will give us cooperation, instead of the wage-system. In both cases, we supersede a diversity of interests resulting in conflict with an identity of interests resulting in the harmonizing of mankind into a perfect whole. That is cooperation, and it has been more or less the dream of all great souls. The noblest efforts of the human mind and the warmest yearnings of the human heart have been enlisted in a constant attempt to reconcile mankind to justice and liberty. Plato's Republic, Moore's Utopia, the various forms of socialism and communism advocated by Fourier, St. Simon, and Owen, were all gropings in this direction. To Charles Fourier and Robert Owen, regarded as philosophers or scientists or seers, the world owes no small debt. No thoughtful person can study their theories, or the actual experiments of the practical organizers who have more or less implicitly followed them, without admitting that in some respects they have come nearer the ideal standard than our general society has yet done. Whether founded on an industrial basis of agriculture, as most of the American organizations have been, or chiefly on one of manufactures, as is the case at Oneida; whether maintaining the individual family intact, with its own separate household, as is done by the Icarians, Eben-Ezers, Zoarites, Aurora and Bethel societies, living lives of celibacy as do the Shakers and Rappists, or advocating somewhat of promiscuous relations as do the Perfectionists of Oneida and Wallingford, it is certain that many of the evils which characterize general societal life are unknown in these communities. Why some communities have lived so long and flourishingly while others have enjoyed but a short and uneventful life, is an interesting question upon which all are not agreed; but the successful experiments furnish a valuable contribution to the history of cooperative efforts. In this country these are the Shakers, established in the Eastern States in 1794 and in the West about 1808; the Rappists, established in 1805; the Zoarites in 1817; the Eben-Ezers in 1844; the Oneida Perfectionists in 1848; the Icarians in 1849; and the Aurora Commune in 1852. In 1874 these communities numbered about five thousand persons and owned over one hundred and fifty thousand acres of land, scattered through thirteen States.

Great, however, as is the respect justly due these pioneers, I can but think the foundation of isolated communities proceeds upon a misconception of the nature of all true growth. I mean, in so far as these communities are regarded as a solution of the labor problem. It is my belief that no individual, and certainly no class of individuals, can rise much above the average height of the mass of mankind. So closely are human interests interwoven, so much is each man the product of causes which he cannot disentangle from the universal web even if he can disentangle himself, that in my judgment no isolated experiment can ever be permanently successful until the great majority of the outside world also are ready or nearly ready for successful cooperation. In other words, I doubt if five thousand people can abolish the wage-system and adopt cooperation by withdrawing from the world; for the very necessity for their withdrawing in order to do so shows that the time has not come when in the natural order of progress the thing can be successfully done. Good principles must be applied in the world, not out of it, and society must grow from one condition to another as everything in Nature grows. We can see this plainly in the matter of government. Even if our republican experiment were an unqualified success, we should hardly recommend Turkey to adopt it; and why? Because Turkey cannot put on republicanism as a man puts on a coat; she must grow into it, as the child grows into the man. And while there may be value in the example which America sets, it is evident that the real work for Turkey must be done in Turkey. Precisely so in the adoption of a republican or cooperative system of industry. We cannot put it on. We must grow into it, remembering always that—

"The eternal step of Progress beats
To that great anthem, calm and slow,
Which God repeats!"

In the meantime, let us study the differences between the two systems and the laws by which the one may gradually melt into the other. Our present system, of each man for himself, creates naturally a governing and a subject class. Cooperation abolishes the two as distinct antagonizing elements, and unites them in harmonious seeking of a common end. One is a system under which, for the sake of the few, the majority of men are subordinated to things; the other is a system under which, for the sake of all, things are subordinated to men. Under the first, the sovereignty of the individual is impossible, because one man is sovereign over another; under the second it is the law, because no man is master and no man slave. We now give books, pictures, travels, to the favored few; cooperation would give them to all. We now give houses, lands, and even what are called the necessities of life, to a minority; cooperation would give them to all. We now in our foolish and extravagant system of a kitchen and wash-room to every house make woman a drudge; cooperation, establishing laundries and kitchens on a basis of science, where one fire shall boil the clothes for several families, and one oven cook their dinners, will summon her to a larger freedom. It was the sublime dream of Fourier that industry should be attractive. No one need be told that under our present system it is often repulsive in the extreme. Cooperation can alone change its character, and cause it to be sought instead of shunned.

It is all to be a growth, however,—slow, natural, sure. As our industrial system has been evolved out of the past, so will this ideal of cooperation be evolved out of our industrial system. Then identity, superseding diversity of interest and linking mankind more closely in one common humanity, at once mutually dependent and yet mutually free,—

"Distribution shall undo excess,
And each man have enough."

My time is more than up, friends, and I have only opened the question. It extends into the distant future, it spreads far and wide,—a gigantic problem to be investigated and solved. I bring it to you because you are organized for the study and promotion of universal justice and love. What it needs, what it must have, is thought. The conscience of the nation must be summoned to this eminently peaceful work. There are elements involved, which, in place, can make this earth a scene of beauty and peace; out of place, may some day make it a field of havoc and war. Draw them into line, adjust them, do them justice. That is the way in which safety and happiness may be secured, and there is no other. I want to see thoughtful men and women, of all classes and conditions, coming together in the spirit of brotherly love, throwing aside all antagonistic feelings, and investigating, freely and searchingly, this whole matter. Nothing prevents that to-day but the hard things which some capitalists and laborers have thought and said of each other. Trampling under foot all such elements of dissension, I appeal to every thoughtful employer to put himself in an attitude for meeting in a broad and catholic spirit the thoughtful employee; I appeal to every thoughtful employee to remember that his employer is, like himself, a result of the system; and I appeal to both, sailing in the same boat as they most certainly are, to study together and from each other's standpoint the causes which have made the system what it is, and the principles which will make it better in the future. Such a joint work as this, partaking of the spirit of Hughes, Mundella, and Morley, across the sea, would be more fundamental than anything yet attempted, and would have a most vital influence for good upon all concerned. I know there are here and there capitalists with great souls who are ready for it; I know there are here and there laborers who are ready for it; and when the two classes sit down side by side to seek and find the truth and stand by it come what will, you may abolish the churches in your midst, every one of them; for the spirit of a religion as broad as humanity will have taken possession of the human heart.

BISHOP HAVEN wants Christianity adopted as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, a cross put on the flag, and clergymen prominent at the inauguration of a President. They have these things in most of the "effete despotisms" of Europe, but it is questionable whether they are any better for it. What kind of Christianity would Bishop Haven have put in, in order to keep peace among the different stripes?—Boston Herald.

THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE.

The twenty-eighth meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science will be held at Saratoga, commencing on Wednesday, August 27. The headquarters of the Association will be at the United States Hotel; the general sessions will all be held at the Town Hall. The meeting will occupy about a week, which will be devoted to the usual addresses of the president and the two vice-presidents, and the reading of papers on different scientific subjects before the several sections of the meeting to which they are appropriate.

The meetings of the Association are a matter of great interest each year to its large membership, and are perhaps entitled to more general public sympathy than they have yet received. In the several cities of the Union where the Association has hitherto held its meetings, it has been most hospitably entertained; and this was notably the case in Buffalo, in 1876, where the presence of Prof. Huxley and a numerous body of eminent foreign men of science, who had come to the United States to attend the Philadelphia Centennial, stimulated the enthusiasm of the citizens. But the Association is entitled to a serious hold upon the regard of the people generally, and it will be its own fault, perhaps, if it fails to make a strong impression upon the community at each annual session. It numbers among its members the most eminent men of science in America, a fair representation of the younger students, besides a number of persons from all professions, swelling its membership at the present time to nearly one thousand. In its organization and plan of meeting, the American Association resembles the British and French associations in spirit, if not always in detail. It is divided into two sections, A and B: the first devoted to mathematics, astronomy, physics, chemistry, and mineralogy; the second to geology, zoology, botany, and anthropology.

The meetings are, of course, devoted more or less to the reading of papers on special subjects; and to encourage all who take an interest in scientific studies, the examining committees have always been generous in their judgment. As the result of each meeting, a handsome volume is issued, which owes its excellent typographical appearance and arrangement of matter to the long-continued labors of the permanent Secretary, Prof. F. W. Putnam, of Cambridge. The finances of the Association are satisfactory, but have been crippled in the past by the attempt to publish too large an annual volume. The papers, which undergo a second sifting before printing, are all worthy of issue by the Association, and among them, indeed, are some of the most noteworthy additions to our knowledge, both in physics and biology. But some papers printed by the Association would have better found their medium of publication in the proceedings of local scientific bodies, or in special serials devoted to their subjects. Of late, while the papers have been read before the Association, they have more often been so disposed of, while some authors have still somewhat needlessly occupied space in the Proceedings.

The general aims of the Association would be greatly furthered if a plan of evening lectures could be entered upon, at which the public could freely attend during each session. The popularization of knowledge would in this way be assisted and the Association benefited, both in reputation and in membership, by identifying itself more boldly than it has yet done with the cause of popular instruction. Some attempts were made in this direction both at Nashville, in 1877, and at St. Louis, in 1878; but no definite action has resulted. We may hope that something may be effected in this direction at Saratoga.

Something of the general spirit of the Association may be gathered from the subjects on which it has thought best to appoint special committees, in order to further its views upon them in the community. Besides subjects of more local interest, such as a new survey of Niagara Falls, which might be left to Canada and the Legislature of our own State to arrange about, the Association has a permanent committee upon weights, measures, and coinage; another to memorialize Congress in relation to meteorological researches; another on the relation of science to the industrial arts; and another on the introduction of science into the public schools. All these subjects are matters of national importance and public interest. That on the relation of science to the industrial arts, of which Prof. Thurston, of the Stevens Institute, is the accomplished chairman, has a most interesting matter to handle. Its purposes are set forth in a letter from Mr. O. Chanute, of New York, and which was read at the St. Louis meeting.

The committee proposes the issuance of a circular inviting communications from leading manufacturers, heads of public works, managers of mines, engineers, agriculturists, or business men, concerning the scientific problems or questions which may have arisen in the pursuit of their avocations, and suggestions as to the subjects or points upon which they may think there exists a lack of scientific elucidation. Upon the results of this circular, the committee propose to publish annually a list of such points and subjects, and invite papers upon them from members of the Association. Further, the committee propose to induce subscriptions by which prizes may be offered for the best papers on the subjects so selected.

The committee on the introduction of science into the public schools certainly yields to none established by the Association in interest at this time. Under our present system, education is changing and becoming more practical in its effects with every day. The old idea of education seems to have been that certain things ought to be learned; and we hear, accordingly, that everybody should know how to read, write, and cipher. The new idea seems rather to start with the pupil, and ask what a given brain and sensory power or capacity should be taught in order to develop to the best advantage, both to the individual and to the society to which it belongs. It is owing to this newer way of looking at the educational problem that we find exact knowledge or science coming to be preferred to ancient languages, for instance, or, generally, to metaphysics. At the present time, it is needful to insist upon the value of science in general culture. Nothing else leads to firmer and yet less prejudiced thoughts, while the material and moral advancement of the nation must always ultimately depend upon the exactitude of its information. The committee of the Association on the teaching of science has a work before it of which we trust it will not be neglectful. In his vice-presidential address at St. Louis, Prof. Aug. R. Grote, who was chiefly instrumental in the formation of the committee, says: "The demand has come up from teachers throughout the country, that they should be better informed as to the manner in which the sciences may be introduced into the schools, and the matter to be taught. It is the duty of this Association to furnish the information. If we have not sympathized with this inquiry in the past, let us assist it in the future. It is quite evident that the sooner this Association commits itself, as a matter of principle, to the furtherance of science among the people, the more following it will have and the greater influence. And if it does not, it will fall behind its peculiar duty and out of the line of advance in human thought. This Association must be prepared to demand more time for scientific studies from the public school authorities, and it must show to every one that education is a matter which not only falls properly under its cognizance, but which it is also prepared to take hold of. This Association should no longer delay to bring all its forces to bear upon the question of science as applied to education. While it does not do so, it will always seem to shirk a duty and ignore one chief end of its existence."

We may informally point out at the present time some of the directions for improvement in our common-school system:

First.—The establishment of primary schools for children between five and nine years of age, where no books are to be used, and object-teaching is to be relied on for instruction in the several branches. The hours for tuition to be less than is now the practice in teaching children between these ages.

Second.—The introduction of physical, natural, and social science in the common schools, while the present teaching of grammar, geography, and declamation may be curtailed, and, in part, discontinued. The outlines of mechanics and industrial arts received in the public schools will assist the pupils in their after-lives.

Third.—The establishment of a higher grade of schools, in which an outline, at least, of the university course be pursued. The tuition to be by demonstrative lectures, and degrees to be conferred which will carry weight in professional and governmental examinations.

Fourth.—The entirely secular administration of the schools, and the teaching of morality without being associated with any system of theology. This reform we seem to clearly owe to the spirit of our republican government and to a national sense of justice.

The time is at hand when our public-school system must be extended in its practice, or fail of its legitimate results. The people not only demand better, fuller, and more practically useful tuition, but from an outside point of view, it is evident that we need, as a nation, that liberal thought which only comes from a rounded knowledge. If the Association can assist this development through its permanent committee on the introduction of science into the schools, it will earn the gratitude of all thinking people in the community.

At its St. Louis meeting last year, the American Association elected a limited number of fellows, choosing among its members Mr. Thomas A. Edison, of Menlo Park, N.J., and of world-wide fame as an inventor, for that honor. Its president for the Saratoga meeting is Prof. Geo. A. Barker, of Philadelphia, whose reputation as a physicist and chemist is already extended. The Saratoga meeting will listen to an address from its retiring President, Prof. O. C. Marsh, of Yale College, which will be heard with interest, in addition to addresses from the two Vice-Presidents of the meeting, Prof. Langley, of Alleghany, and Major J. W. Powell, of Washington. The papers to be presented bid fair to be of more than average interest in many departments, and the most noteworthy will be reported.—Scientific American.

THE FRENCH REPUBLIC AND THE JESUITS.

POPULAR EDUCATION AND FREE INSTITUTIONS IN THE UNITED STATES EXPOSED TO NEW PERILS.

The action of the French Chamber of Deputies, on July 9, in passing, by a vote of three hundred and fifty-two to one hundred and fifty-nine, the Ferry Educational Bill, affords an important indication of the drift of European sentiment in regard to the baneful influence of Jesuitical control over educational institutions. It also foreshadows an increase of the ferocity of the Catholic attack upon the public-school system of the United States, inasmuch as a large proportion of the Jesuits expelled from France will inevitably emigrate to this country, and thus strengthen the ranks of the powerful body of insidious agitators who are already making tremendous efforts to drive Catholic children into parochial schools, and thus to at once provide influential positions for Jesuit priests and teachers, and to greatly extend the intellectual domain in which hostility to free institutions can be skillfully and systematically inculcated.

To understand the motives that incited the passage of the Ferry Bill, it should be remembered that it is levelled chiefly against the Jesuits, and that the government has determined to compel them to cease tampering with the educational system of France, because it believes the power they acquire over the minds and consciences of their pupils is habitually and persistently used for the purpose of destroying the French Republic.

In one of M. Ferry's late speeches he said: "Nothing in the bill prevents any religious body, except, of course, the Jesuits, from bringing its statutes and asking to be recognized"; and in urging their exclusion from positions in which they could train the intellects of a considerable proportion of the children of influential Frenchmen, he contended that as the Jesuits had been successfully driven from every European country except Russia and Prussia, and even banished temporarily from the Papal dominions on account of their insidious and dangerous interference with public affairs, their open and systematic hostility to existing French institutions could not safely be left unchecked.

An English journal, in criticising the Ferry Bill, says introduction can only be explained on the theory that "either the Republicans must silence the Church or the Church will destroy the Republic; and the large majority voting in favor of this measure in the French Chamber of Deputies is doubtless attributable to a profound conviction that, in addition to participation in incessant and dangerous intrigues set on foot for the purpose of restoring Bourbonism in Imperialism, the Jesuits and affiliated orders are constantly teaching their pupils to hate the Republic, to disparage progress, and to favor such a reaction as would again place the governing power of the civilized world mainly in the hands of priests, cardinals, and the Pope."

The practical measures adopted by the powers that control Roman Catholic movements are varied with the condition and requirements of different localities, and the exact things and particular methods of operation which have excited so much alarm and indignation among the Republicans of France may not therefore be precisely duplicated in the United States. But the ends sought in all countries are avowedly identical, and the American people may, therefore, see in the events connected with the agitation in France, the convulsion in Belgium, and Bismarck's energetic efforts to release German schools from insidious sectarian control, a reflection of home perils rapidly increasing in magnitude.—Philadelphia Progress.

Hardly had the ink been dry on my paragraph in last Progress referring to the assault of the Catholic priests of Belgium upon the magnificent communal school-system of that kingdom, before the news is flashed over the wires that King Leopold II. has been threatened with death if he ratifies the bill recently passed by the Belgian Parliament depriving the Catholic clergy of the control of elementary education.

And in another column is a careful condensation of the late letter of the Bishop of Toronto, Canada, announcing the doctrine that the Catholic religion must be taught in public schools. I commend the courage and candor with which this declaration is made, and it gives me great pleasure to add that the eminent Archbishop Wood, of this diocese, has caused the pastoral letter of the Bishop of Toronto to be published in the organ of the Catholic population in Philadelphia.

On such a question, affecting the very life of American liberty and modern civilization, there must, of necessity, be strong feelings on both sides, and there can be no question as to motives, when the Catholic Church advances to the assault on popular education and boldly delivers the first blow. If the American people do not resist and crush this dangerous audacity, they have lost all sense of their own right and of their imperative duties to their country.—Philadelphia Progress, July 12.

SUNDAY LAW IN NORWICH, CONN.

The people of Norwich, Conn., are being stirred up a little by the Sunday-law reformers. We give below some newspaper items which have recently appeared upon the subject. The following were recent telegraphic despatches:—

NORWICH, Conn., Aug. 4.

The officers of Watch Hill Steamboat Company have been notified by City Attorney Ripley that the Sunday law will be enforced. And notice has also been given that all who patronize them on that day will be prosecuted. This step has been taken on account of complaints made by several clergymen. If the reformers are successful in their raid on the boat, others will step in and make complaints against the horse-cars, omnibuses, livery stables, railroads, etc., and it would not be strange if a complaint was made against housewives for attending to their domestic duties, for one of those same laws says: "The cooking of bread, pies, cakes, and other edibles on Sunday shall be punished by fine." One thing is certain: the steamer will make her regular trip next Sunday.

Still Later.

DON'T CARE FOR SUNDAY LAWS.

NORWICH, Conn., Aug. 10.

The steamer Ella made her usual fortnightly trip to Watch Hill and back to-day. The boat recently was notified of prosecution under the State Sunday-law in case she made any more Sunday trips. No arrests. The statute allows complaints to be filed within a month after the offense.

Editorial Comments.

Connecticut's blue laws are revived to stop the Sunday excursions of the boats belonging to the Norwich, New London & Watch Hill Steamboat Company. Pastors of Norwich churches having entered a formal complaint against the excursions, the city attorney has had to serve a notice upon the company that he will be compelled to prosecute them and the Sunday excursionists, if the Sabbath excursions are continued. The penalty to which passengers are liable is $4 each. In Connecticut, under the still existing blue laws, a person has no right to walk out on Sunday other than to church, no right to drive a team, and three persons assembled on the street in secular conversation are liable to arrest.—Boston Herald.

HAMELIZ OF ST. PETERSBURG reports a noteworthy instance of Jewish agriculture in Poland. In the year 1835 a wealthy Israelite of Warsaw conceived the idea of proving to the enemies of his people, that all their accusations of Jewish laziness and incapability to work were false. The name of that man was Salman Posner. He founded three Jewish colonies on the large estates which he possessed in the settlements of Kuchary, Dzikowicz, and Kodolowka, granting to every Jewish settler sufficient land to work and a sum of money to purchase the necessary agricultural implements, cattle, poultry, etc. He made conditions with the colonists, that they should engage in no other pursuit while on his settlements, and that they should work under the instructions of the Polish agriculturists whom he had engaged for the purpose. Twenty-six Jewish settlers went to the three settlements. In a term of four or five years they have become such experts, that the assistance of the Polish superintendents was found unnecessary. Later still, their Christian neighbors came to ask their advice and assistance. Notwithstanding their land is inferior in quality to that of their neighbors, by their skill and assiduous work they succeeded in raising better crops. The number of Jewish colonists in those settlements amounts at the present time to five hundred. They have their public and educational institutions; they fill large orders of produce to the neighboring cities, and of timber to the railroads which are built in surrounding districts. As a community they stand in great respect for their industry and thrift.—Jewish Advance.

Poetry.

[For THE INDEX.]

IN MEMORIAM.

E. F.

Forswearing outer
For Inner Light,
Soul-secrets revealing
By love's insight:

Old friends now missing
World-service of yore,
Pass on, nor salute him
Nor enter his door.

True heart's forgiving
For each and all,
His loneliness loveth
Their names to recall.

On-tolling cheerfully—
Servant of Truth!
Years creeping o'er him
Steal not his youth.

New lovers surround him,
But turn not his head;
Persuade all comers:
"Awake from the dead!"

"Life is the living
While day follows day,
Is free of self-seeking
As children at play.

"Awake, then, to Truth
All-cheering and strong!
No power can destroy you,
Nor make its right wrong.

"A providence deeper Than man's fragile wit
Doth brood o'er thy living,
The mark always hit.

"This benediction,
'THINE OWN HEART HEED,'
The god of the soul-world
Sends for his need."

The change coming quickly
He enters no gloom;

The Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 21, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY of REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY of REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

LOCAL RATIONALISTIC SOCIETIES.

The value of ideas and principles is chiefly in proportion to their adaptation to the practical ends of existence. This is the ultimate criterion by which those of rationalism are destined to be tried. They must prove their superiority in this particular, if they are to stand and triumph. The Church has hitherto assumed to be the school of virtue, the regulator of society, to embrace within its ample administration provisions for all the spiritual interests of man. But rationalism is the demonstration of the inadequacy and failure of these claims. Is it prepared to present something better to the world? That is the great question now before it. The Church and the life of to-day, we have seen, are out of joint. The bond of unity which once held them together is broken. Mankind are continually drifting beyond church lines. They are turning their back upon it more and more. The best intelligence and thought of the age has, practically at least, renounced its doctrines. Its strength is mainly in the inherited superstition and ignorance of less enlightened times, and the uncritical and unthoughtful minds and superficial character which still prevail even in the higher classes of society.

The aspiring heart and emancipated intellect of the time look to rationalism with the earnest interrogation, What have you to offer to take the place of the things we are discarding,—to answer more effectually to the actual and permanent needs of life to which religion aims to minister? The Church has been the sovereign empire. It has demanded and claimed that before it the heart and intellect of humanity should bow. It has embraced in its possession childhood, manhood, and age; the great events of life, birth, marriage, death; its seasons of joy and sorrow; merry meetings and solemn festivals; its grandest ambitions and most inspiring purposes; accumulations and hoarded treasures; genius, education, literature, art in its various forms,—nay, even to a large extent science itself, its inevitable and natural enemy.

Has rationalism within itself the capacity of an equal comprehensiveness? Has it as complete and intimate adaptability to the contents and significance of our existence? If not, or so far as it falls of this, it is a deluding and unpracticable dream to cherish the expectation that it can take the place which the Church has occupied. It is very clear that this cannot be compassed within the bounds of the functions of any mere club or debating society. It must be broader and more varied in the range of its operations and aims than any specific reform or political purpose, excellent and consonant as each and all of these may be with its essential nature and spirit.

If rationalism is to supersede the Church, it must compete with the Church upon its own ground. It must fulfil all it fulfils, but better. In the first place, it needs to take possession of Sunday. This is the great religious day of the week. Religion upon this day sits upon its throne, issues its mandates, and delivers its inculcations. It should be the aim of rationalism to possess itself of Sunday, in order to turn it to more reasonable, needed, and practical account. And one of the first steps toward such a realization is the establishment of the radical Sunday meeting. This naturally involves the formation of local rationalistic societies for the purpose of accomplishing in their own way all that the Church seeks to, in their respective communities. There are obvious and imperative reasons why rationalistic societies, if they are to be competitors with the Church for correspondent ends, should have its regular Sunday meeting. It is a day of rest and abstinence from ordinary pursuits.

The inherited traditions and customs of society naturally predispose the mind to such a use of it. It is furthermore important that at least one day in seven should be given to the more direct promotion than our ordinary life affords of the higher education and culture. It is not necessary for us here to describe what these Sunday meetings should be. Their character will be determined by the circumstances of each instance. They may be for the purpose of listening to discourses from a single individual, preacher, or minister, if the latter term may be allowed; or they may be for a different speaker or several speakers on each occasion. All of these methods are in practice by societies already formed, and which may be regarded as the pioneers in such a development of the rationalistic movement. Then, in conjunction with the Sunday meeting just indicated, which must necessarily be chiefly for adult persons, there must be efficient and correspondent provision for the moral and intellectual (or religious, if the word is preferred) nurture of the young. This is as urgent and indispensable as the Sunday meeting we have referred to. Certainly, if rationalistic principles are all we claim, they are as important for our children as for ourselves. They are as adapted to the dawning mind of the infant as to the ripest intelligence. Certainly, then, they have a right to receive such consideration.

Can we justify ourselves in exultation in our own freedom and clearer perceptions of truth, and suffer them to have their intellects confused and their spirits darkened by the errors which have impeded our own spiritual development? This is a question that involves a solemn duty, from which we cannot escape if rationalism produces that higher nobleness of life and finer sense of duty which we assume. The radical Sunday-school, then, must be the necessary adjunct of the radical society. That the proposition is practical, we need but to point to illustrations of its successful operation in connection with the free religious societies of Florence and Providence. But apart from the use of Sunday we have indicated, the rationalistic society should embrace social educational and philanthropic aims. It should strive to foster, first of all, among its members a spirit of cordial fraternity, and avail itself of all possible agencies and auxiliaries to promote such an attainment. It should be emphatically democratic in character, and assiduously seek to avoid cliques and class-distinctions among its membership. It should especially recognize the demand there is in human nature for amusement. This would be particularly important in country places, where the people are shut out from the facilities of this character which cities afford, and where life is likely to be to a larger extent monotonous.

And here we are prompted to suggest the aid which may be found toward this object in the dramatic element in human nature or the drama. There is among people everywhere a fondness for dramatic representation, and the rationalistic society should seek to utilize this characteristic, not only, as intimated, for the purpose of supplying amusement in the communities where such societies exist, but as mediums for the communication of higher influences and instruction.

The value and dignity of the drama in these respects, under wise and wholesome regulation, have just been recognized with much emphasis by Matthew Arnold in one of the English reviews. He would have the State take it under its guardianship and support, to a certain extent. "The people will have the theatre," he says; "then make it a good one. Let your two or three provincial towns institute, with municipal subsidy and co-operation, theatres such as you institute in the metropolis with State subsidy and co-operation. So you will restore the English theatre, and then a modern drama of your own will probably spring up amongst you." "The theatre is irresistible; organize the theatre."

Such are the words of Matthew Arnold in respect to an institution which sustains so important a relation to the popular life and manners. May not rationalism take a hint from them in the organization of its local societies? May not the drama be utilized, not only for the purpose of recreation, in such instances, during the week, but, for moral ends, occasionally on Sunday?

The local rationalistic societies should include, in addition to social culture and amusement, the graver objects of education and philanthropy,—classes during the week for special studies and intellectual pursuits in literature, science, philosophy, as the case may be, so that the intensity of the convictions of their members may be deepened and expanded by knowledge and intelligence.

But, more important still than all that has been enumerated, the crowning work of all its work, is philanthropy or charity. The earnest, sincere radical must aim at deeds as well as words. He must attest the largeness and magnanimity of his spirit by self-forgetful consideration for others. He must show an interest in the welfare of those about him, and endeavor to devise and advance plans for social amelioration and reformation. Let not those who are ready to join hands with him in rationalistic fellowship, whose hearts are throbbing with high enthusiasm and keen sensibility to the wrongs and evils of life, find in his presence no quickening inspiration, but disappointment only, and words, words, words leading to nothing. Let him seek, while a critic and philosopher, for outgrowth from selfishness, the culture of generosity, the consecration of himself, through self-denial, to the good of the race.

It has seemed to us in temporarily assuming the charge of THE INDEX, in view of very noticeable demonstrations among radicals of late of a tendency to more constructive effort, that it might be a fitting and profitable discharge of the work assigned us to take a cursory survey of the present condition of rationalism, particularize what seemed to us some of its needs, and suggest a few of the initiatory steps toward the consummation so much to be desired. The theme, though sketched in a light and hurried manner, has grown upon us continually, and far out-run the original intention. We trust that some may have found interest in it, and that the labor has not been wholly mispent. Here, then, we lay it aside, not without a very vivid consciousness of its incomparable gravity and moment and our incomplete and imperfect treatment of it. Other subjects await attention.

THE CONCORD SCHOOL OF PHILOSOPHY.

This experiment, which seemed so rash to outsiders, has proved a complete success, and it has seemed almost a resurrection of the old days of transcendentalism to have companies meet on so high a plane, with such earnest interest in questions of philosophy. The Nestor of Idealism has lost nothing of his old faith, and it has been refreshing to see the delight with which he has sat at the feet of younger men, and listened with interest and reverence, although the theme was quite differently treated from his wonted manner.

Mr. Emerson's spirit has hovered around the school, although he has been able to assist at very few of its sessions; but the full house that greeted his one appearance as a lecturer shows that there is no voice so welcome as that which for forty years has spoken the highest truths of intuition and experience, never for a moment seeking to charm the popular ear by any lowering of his standard or any veiling of the truth. The old proverb is reversed in his case; for never was a man more revered and loved by his own townspeople, with whom he has ever lived on the simplest terms of friendly intercourse.

The high-priestess of our modern Delphi has added her words of never-failing wisdom, cheer, and sympathy; and her rare powers of intelligence, her rich learning, her long experience of life, and her wide acquaintance with noble minds, both living and dead, have enriched the conversations and helped and inspired the lecturers. One can almost believe in immortality on earth, as well as beyond it, in seeing such a trio as Mr. Alcott, Mr. Emerson, and Miss Peabody, all of whom have long passed the period allotted as the span of life, but who, instead of finding the few more years only years of trouble and sorrow, fill them with works of beneficence, and pour out their treasures of thought, giving and receiving with equal delight.

It was worth the pilgrimage to the school of Concord, only to learn this lesson of the possibilities of age, and to see how serenely and joyously and beautifully it puts the crown upon a noble life.

The West has responded nobly, and sent us admirable representatives of the free thought and life of that region. It is an astonishment to many who think of all beyond the Alleghenies as a region devoted to material speculation or party politics, to see the ripe scholarship and philosophic thought which come from her schools.

I have unfortunately not been able to hear the lectures of Dr. Jones, but he is spoken of as the most thorough Platonist in the country, and as interpreting his most difficult works with great vigor and clearness.

Mr. Harris has unquestionably been the centre of interest. It is amazing that a mixed audience could sit for nearly two hours on hot summer afternoons, delighted with his thorough treatment of metaphysics. Surely he has proved that "Philosophy is musical as is Apollo's lute"; for all have felt with the old woman who did not understand Greek, but loved the sound of it. The admirable training of Mr. Harris' mind, by which he is able to keep all his ideas in relation and order, is so delightful, in contrast to the blundering and floundering which are so often characteristic of those who venture into the depths of philosophy, that one has the delight of seeing a thing well done, if he goes no further. And then around this exact framework is a twining of bright sparkling illustration, so homely and racy and given in such a genuine modern tone and dialect, that you are not sure that it is not, after all, good, plain, practical sense of the Dr. Franklin school that you are listening to, instead of the abstruse and misty German philosophy of Hegel. To be sure, one frequently gets beyond his depth, but he is so sure of his guide that he feels safe and confident of coming to land again.

The West, too, has furnished others who have added much to the conversation. I have also lost all but Mr. Wasson's introductory lecture; but the deep interest which that excited, and my knowledge of his thought, make me sure of the good influence which his admirable treatment of his theme, Political Philosophy, must have exercised. Shallow thinking is one of the greatest dangers, and Mr. Wasson gives no license to it. Probably no man has given such profound thought to certain phases of American history and politics as he has; and we trust that this course of lectures will make his ideas known to appreciative minds, and that we shall soon have them in permanent form. So the school has been in every sense a success, and the managers are already talking of next year.

But one word of warning: the summer school has become an institution; but is there not danger that it tempts us all to that added strain of work which is sure to break the camel's back? The vacation gives the rare opportunity of bringing together students from various parts of the country. A little of this rich life of thought is refreshing and helpful, even to the tired teacher or writer; but we must remember the "modest charm of not too much." The test of the summer school, as of the Sunday, should be to leave us fresh and vigorous for the work of the year.

THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The Annual Congress of this body will hold its sessions on the 13th and 14th of September in the city of Cincinnati. All local Liberal Leagues, whether auxiliary or otherwise, and all associations formed for the purpose of effecting the complete secularization of the government and of the public schools, are cordially invited to be represented by full delegations, as will appear from the official call soon to be published. A mass convention of liberals is also called, by a committee headed by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, to meet in concert with the League at the same time and place.

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

BOSTON, Aug. 12, 1879.

[To prevent misapprehension among those who may not be informed as to the facts, it should be stated that the National Liberal League above noticed, though planned and organized by Mr. Abbot, its President up to a little short of a year ago, and until then almost identical with his name, is not the division of the movement which he now represents. The National Liberal League was projected for the promotion of the Secularization of the State, and steadily adhered to that object until its annual Congress at Syracuse, in October, 1878.

At that time, an issue foreign to its purpose was forced upon it, pertaining to the circulation of obscene literature through the mails. By the adroit tactics of an extemporized majority on that occasion, Mr. Abbot and the former officers of the League were displaced, and a new set elected favoring the abolition of the existing law against the crime just referred to, and committing the League to this position. As a result of the action, Mr. Abbot and a majority of the founders of the League withdrew and organized the National Liberal League of America. Instead of the abolition of the law for the prevention of the circulation of obscene literature, it advocates such a modification of the law as shall prevent an abuse and misconception of it that conflicts with the exercise of legitimate personal liberty. Of this League Mr. Abbot, with perfect unanimity, was made the President. THE INDEX is its official organ.—ED.]

THE GENESIS OF ETHICS COLLOQUIALLY CANVASSED.

NO. II.

Old School Philosopher.—Well, sir, it really seems to be fairly inferable from your utterances in our last discussion, that you are of the opinion that there is no such thing as natural justice. Am I doing you any sort of injustice in concluding that to be your position?

Rationalist.—Not at all, if you mean by natural justice anything that is not the product and outgrowth of society, just as language, laws, music, sculpture, commerce, politics, etc., are.

O. S. Phil.—But, see here: suppose two savages encounter each other in the wilderness, a thousand miles away from any society, and that far beyond the cognizance of any community and the jurisdiction of any State, has the savage that is naked a right to take the other's buffalo robe?

Rationalist.—No, sir; yet, if he does take it, he will violate no right of the other, nor any right whatever.

O. S. Phil.—What! violate no right when he takes another man's property!

Rationalist.—The other man could have no property, if the case were of the two being entirely isolated and independent of society, as you have supposed it.

O. S. Phil.—Do you say that the man who has chased, slain, and flayed the buffalo has no right to its skin, as against any one who may want to take it away from him?

Rationalist.—None in the world; or, at most, none in the wilderness, which is their world for the purpose of this discussion. For if he could be supposed to have a right to the buffalo's skin, there would, of course, be a wrong in depriving him of it; but if so, then he himself must have been guilty of a great wrong, when, in order to possess himself of it, he deprived the buffalo, not only of its skin, but of life itself. And as a right cannot result from a wrong without the help of society, it is obvious that the savage who sports the buffalo-robe has no more right to it than the naked one or anybody else.

O. S. Phil.—Yes, but Savage No. One has invested his labor in the buffalo-robe; therefore, he is entitled to it.

Rationalist.—Therefore, he would be entitled to it by the laws of most countries and the social canons of most communities; but not entitled to it, or to anything else, in the absence of such laws or canons. Or I might answer that if Savage No. One has acquired title from the buffalo by his labor after and upon the buffalo, then Savage No. Two may effect a transfer of such title from No. One to himself, by performing like labor after and upon Savage No. One, or whatever labor, be it much or little, that is required for his getting possession of the robe; for that is all that Savage No. One did to acquire a supposed ownership.

O. S. Phil.—I have, perhaps, given you an advantage (apparent at least) in the argument, by taking (as it was unnecessary to do) an instance wherein Savage No. One came, himself, into possession by violence. Let us, therefore, say, instead of a buffalo-robe, that he is in possession of a canoe fashioned by himself from the trunk of a tree he himself has felled. Has he not a right to that canoe, which, while doing violence to no animate being, causing pain or distress to nothing, he has fairly earned by the sweat of his brow?

Rationalist.—Unfortunately, he has been sweating in a region where the sweat of his brow is not a legal tender nor a valid consideration of any sort; where his labor counts for no more, against one stronger or cunninger than he, than does the labor of the honey-bee or of the mother-partridge that works all summer long in finding food for her brood, to have them all trapped and freeseased before mid-winter. When, therefore, Savage No. Two comes to take the canoe, it will not amount to a row of pins for No. One to tell him that he cut down the tree and dug out its trunk; for No. One would probably say (were he to deign to argue the matter at all), "The tree was not yours, and but for your selfish and ruthless act in destroying it, as though you were lord of this wilderness, it would have afforded shelter, shade, nuts, and bedding for you and me both, from time to time, all our lives, and for our posterity generations to come, and then supplied an immense amount of excellent fuel to whomever was living here when it fell. But as you have, in destroying it, shown as much disregard for the interests of others as is characteristic of men in civilized communities, I must adopt some such precaution against you as is there taken by the strong to obviate results of the unbridled selfishness of the weak. My interest requires that I should take care that this transaction of yours becomes not a precedent. Wherefore, I am going to enter a protest that you will be certain to respect. You have destroyed the tree merely for your own convenience, because you were able to. Well, now, for my convenience (in preventing you from destroying any more trees), and because I am able to, I am going to take you into my service and keep you so henceforward, feeding you when you serve me well and flogging you when you serve me ill. Arise, slave! shoulder that canoe, and walk before me to the river, where you can paddle while I ponder and repose."

O. S. Phil.—I think if I were No. One, unless No.

Two were very much the brawler and carried much the longer spear and appeared to have his mind thoroughly made up, I should venture to hesitate long enough to suggest that there were numberless other trees remaining, probably amply sufficient to afford him and his, as well as me and mine, shelter, shade, nuts, etc., forever, and that to deprive me permanently of my canoe and liberty would cause me a degree of mental and bodily suffering incommensurate with the satisfaction he would derive from the ownership of the canoe and of me, and that therefore, upon the whole, harm would be done in the world by the course he purposed.

Rationalist.—And No. Two would doubtless rejoice somewhat in this wise: That, granting there might possibly be still trees enough left after No. One and others of his tastes in the future took as many as they needed or fancied for canoes, paddles, etc., it was also true that there would probably be a sufficient number of savages still left free and roaming at large, for all useful purposes, after the enslavement of No. One; that a canoe manned by a slave was twice as useful as otherwise it would be; that while he would be sorry to cause No. One the mental and physical suffering the latter apprehended, he happened to be so constituted that he could better bear for other people to endure a great deal of suffering than that he himself should not have the convenience of some one always at hand to do his bidding. That as to the harm which No. One feared would be done in the world by reason of such suffering of his as would be in excess of No. Two's satisfaction, they need not concern themselves, seeing that neither of them was a member of or connected with any of the communities or bodies politic which constitute the world,—all this world, at least, that could be said to experience harm by the suffering that was in it.

O. S. Phil.—But then I should say to No. Two (supposing still I were No. One): That while the consummation of such a proceeding as he was purposing might conduce considerably to his own immediate convenience and luxury, it would not only much more conduce to my inconvenience and distress, but (in the precedent thereby made) it would give rise to incalculable evils, not only to my posterity, but to his as well; for that if he enslaved me simply because of his being the stronger, he would set the example of, and justify, the enslavement of his own weaker children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren, etc., by his or my stronger ones. And as there would be nothing to prevent two or more weak ones from conspiring and uniting their joint strength against a stronger one who had enslaved or who sought to enslave them, for the purpose of regaining or perpetuating their liberties, or even for the purpose of making the stronger one their slave, it would be seen that No. Two's enslavement of me would inaugurate such a continual and violent strife as would in the future be incompatible with the real and permanent happiness of any one concerned, and certainly productive of great misery to the majority. Moreover, that there could be no subsistence for anybody unless somebody labored, and that the surest way of inducing labor was to allow those who labored to possess and control the results of their labor. That, therefore, it would be much better that he and I should come to an understanding that each of us was to be perfectly free to fell trees, dig canoes, kill and skin buffaloes, and do whatever else would not interfere with the like equal freedom of the other, and that whoever dug a canoe or stripped off a hide should be deemed the owner thereof, and should not be deprived of its possession and control without his consent.

Rationalist.—Yes, yes; or, in other words, you would propose that the incipient community of which No. Two and yourself were the constituents should ordain the sort of justice which you wanted to prevail. Well; and if you succeeded in getting No. Two to acquiesce in your views, such community would enact or ordain that sort of justice, and to that extent would make one sort of morality. But in case you failed of convincing or persuading him, while he, on the other hand, convinced or coerced you into an acquiescence with his first-announced intentions, the young community of which you and he were the members would have ordained quite a different sort of justice, and to that extent made a different morality from the one you favored. And in either case, such community would have done just what I am contending every community has done,—that is to say, made its own justice and its own morality; or, which is practically the same, adopted and (more or less) modified some preëxisting justice and morality.

O. S. Phil.—Ay, but you cannot deny that that which I (as No. One) would have proposed would have been the more beneficent?

Rationalist.—The more beneficent for you, No. One, in case of your having wisdom enough to use your freedom, canoe, buffalo robe, and other property in such a way as to make yourself happier than you would be with No. Two as your master; which might or might not be the case. But probably not more beneficent for No. Two or for his posterity, who would else likely have had No. One's posterity to be their hewers of wood and drawers of water. Suppose, however, the morality you would have favored was not only better, as respects beneficence, than the morality No. Two had compelled you to help establish, but that, better than any conceivable morality, it would have accomplished "the greatest good to the greatest number": would that fact have entitled it, in your estimation, to be deemed and designated absolute, universal, or God-given morality?

O. S. Phil.—Why should it not?

Rationalist.—Simply because when you say "morality," you don't mean merely a line of conduct which, if generally pursued, would result in the greatest good to the greatest number. And when you say "that which produces the greatest good to the greatest number," you don't every time and necessarily mean morality. In other words, there are practices which you consider highly moral; and the abstention from which you would consider highly immoral, which you do not believe are productive of the greatest good to the greatest number.

O. S. Phil.—Name one, if you please.

Rationalist.—Do you not consider the practice of nourishing and rearing malformed and idiotic infants to adulthood good morality, and that it would be very immoral to allow them to perish, or to deprive them of life even at the earliest stage of their being, and by a process perfectly painless?

O. S. Phil.—Certainly.

Rationalist.—Well, do you so consider it, simply because, after due deliberation regarding the matter, you have arrived at the conclusion that the rearing of deformed and idiotic children conduces upon the whole and in the long run to the welfare of society, or would you not be strenuous in your opposition to a law requiring or even permitting of such children being promptly chloroformed to death, even though you were convinced beyond question that it would be better for society, better for the parents, and quite as well, in average cases, for the children themselves, that such a law should exist, and that popular practice should accord therewith?

O. S. Phil.—I presume I should.

Rationalist.—I am certain you would. There are still other canons of your moral code, having no connection with, or else in controversy of, the greatest good to the greatest number, as, for instance, that regarding abstention from labor on Sunday, the vivisection of animals in the interest of medical science, etc., etc., which I might cite also, but it is unnecessary. You do not subscribe to the maxim that "the end justifies the means"; and this you would, of course, have to do in order to limit the definition of morality to that which effects "the greatest good to the greatest number."

O. S. Phil.—You will please bear in mind, I have not insisted on limiting it to such a definition.

THE BROOKLYN PHILOSOPHICAL CLUB.

BY LEWIS G. JAMES.

It seems to be popularly supposed by the "outside barbarian," that the intellectual life of Brooklyn is given over wholly to sensationalism, consisting, we will say, of one part Beecher and two parts Talmage. Brooklyn is called "the city of churches"; and if, by accident, the transient visitor in New York goes over to the sister city, it is usually either en route for Coney Island (at this season of the year), or else to hear somebody preach. And the preaching of Brooklyn has, certainly, not only a strong flavor of sensationalism, but this may almost be said to be a "redemptive feature," which brightens up the otherwise dead level of Orthodoxy which is characteristic of nearly all the popular preachers of the city.

From this sweeping verdict, however, we must except the teaching of our "liberal" churches, and especially of our young "poet-preacher," Rev. John W. Chadwick, whose gospel of rational religion is heard gladly by a fair congregation drawn from among the most intelligent of our middle classes. His words are always honest, brave, and inspired by an utter sincerity of thought, corrected by constant and careful study in a wide range of the best literature. If he has not, like Frothingham, and Potter, and Abbot, and others of the rational faith, broken loose wholly from the Unitarian denomination, it is certainly from no base fear of consequences. He holds no opinions in his study which he does not proclaim in his pulpit. He speaks his sincerest thought; and one may always go to hear him, confident of being quickened and satisfied, intellectually and morally, as well as religiously.

Within the past three years, an organization known as the Philosophical Club, and composed of a number of our leading citizens of intellectual tastes and generally of liberal views, has held a series of very interesting and satisfactory meetings. It should be said at the outset, that it is in no sense a partisan, sectarian, or proselyting association. Its object is primarily the satisfaction, enlightenment, and culture of its members; and it has never, as a society, endeavored to influence the public mind in favor of any particular views. Its meetings, held for one or two seasons in public halls, but more recently in private parlors, have been accessible only to those receiving cards of invitation, and these cards are ordinarily sent to few beside the members of the club. Many papers, some of them of decided originality and value, have been read before the club; but such as have been published have been printed wholly on the individual responsibility of the writers.

Those who understand the working of such organizations know that the practical labor of their conduct falls usually mainly into a few hands; and it is, I think, doing no injustice to others who have assisted in this work, to say that the credit of organizing, sustaining, and conducting the Philosophical Club is due chiefly to its able President, Mr. Daniel M. Tredwell. Mr. Tredwell, who is an enthusiastic and devoted student in ethnology and anthropology, a member of the American Ethnological Society, and honorary member of the Society of Antiquaries of Copenhagen, Denmark, owns one of the largest and finest private libraries, especially in these departments of literature, in America. He also possesses a most valuable and extensive collection of works relating to our late civil war; his printed catalogue covering this subject alone, numbering over seventeen hundred volumes.

The first regular meeting of the club was held March 26, 1876; and between that time and Dec. 13, 1877, fifty-eight meetings were held, at which forty-eight papers on different subjects were read and discussed. The average attendance was about fifty members. Since that time, nearly as many more meetings have been held, and the attendance has averaged, possibly, a little greater.

The general character of the discussions may, perhaps, be best understood by the subjects of the papers. One of the earlier papers was an interesting and suggestive essay by the President, Mr. Tredwell, on "Spontaneity," or spontaneous generation, in which he took strong ground in favor of the occurrence of this phenomenon, arguing for its logical necessity as a part of the great universal evolutionary process in Nature,—from the experiments of Bastian, of which he gave an exceedingly interesting account; and also from original experiments of his own, conducted with great carefulness and accuracy, and in which he claimed that he had himself seen the production of infusorial life from dead matter wherein every living germ had been effectually destroyed. He combated powerfully the theory held by Huxley and Tyndall, with arguments that seemed logical and conclusive. Now that Tyndall has declared his belief that matter possesses "the promise and potency of all forms of life," and his great fellow evolutionist, Haeckel, unhesitatingly accepts spontaneous generation as a necessary step in the process of development, Mr. Tredwell may well feel that he has been a pioneer in the advocacy of a theory which, sooner or later, must be accepted by all who reject the hypothesis of miraculous interference in the creation of organic life.

Other papers during the season of 1876-7 were one by Mr. Fales on "Robespierre"; one by Mr. McLean, of the Brooklyn Eagle, on "The Formation of Opinions"; an interesting lecture by Rev. John W. Chadwick on "Zoroaster," giving a sympathetic history of the great religious movement which resulted in the establishment of an Aryan monotheism, and, in its later dualistic stages, exercised a marked influence on the development of Talmudic Judaism and early Christianity; an exceedingly valuable and suggestive paper by Mr. F. Dana Reed on "Climate and Creeds," tracing the influences of the physical environment in the genesis and development of the different religions; a very original and interesting essay, illustrated by painted diagrams and music, by Dr. P. H. Van Der Weyde, on "Sound and Light—Tone and Color—Music and Painting," abounding in comparisons and analogies which a brief sketch is wholly insufficient to report with justice; a paper by N. McGregor Steele, Esq., in favor of "whipping-posts as a mode of punishment for ordinary crimes"; another, at the opening of the fall meetings, by Mr. Tredwell, on "The Fallacy of the Metaphysical Method," in which he argued that no metaphysical reasoning can end in a satisfactory and universally accepted conclusion, and that the true reliance in philosophy and scientific research must be on the experimental method; one by Mr. Wm. H. Boughton on "The Religion of Philosophy"; an able and philosophical essay by Wm. M. Ivins, Esq., a rising young lawyer, on "The Ethics of Penal Sanction"; a paper by C. W. L. F. Morrow, Esq., on "Bacon and his Influence"; one by Gen. L. M. Peck, on "Social Constitution and Dislocation"; one by Dr. F. B. Greene on the subject, "Can we Evolve Common Sense?"; and an able paper by Clement D. Newman, Esq., on "Advent Duties."

On May 24, 1877, the society held a "Philosophical Symposium," at which essays were read as follows: On "The Early Philosophers of the Ethical Phase of Philosophy," by Mr. W. E. S. Fales; on "The Theological Phase of Philosophy," by H. W. Hinrichs; on "The Scholastic Phase of Philosophy," by John H. Hall, Esq.; on "The Metaphysical Phase of Philosophy," by Mr. Andrew McLean; on "The Positive Phase of Philosophy," by C. F. Adams, Esq.; and on "The Rhythmic Phase of Philosophy," by Mr. Wm. H. Boughton.

During the past season, the meetings have been rendered rather more pleasant and social than heretofore, being held in private parlors instead of a public hall. They usually have been very well attended. Mr. Tredwell opened with a paper which he afterwards repeated by request, at Everett Hall. His subject was "Matthew and Philostratus Compared." The paper gave evidence of great research in a literature unknown and inaccessible to most readers, and the views presented were of the most radical character. From a comparison of the earliest Christian Gospel,—that "according to" Saint Matthew,—with the biography of Apollonius of Tyana, by Philostratus, and a careful investigation of the writings of the early Christian fathers bearing on the subject, Mr. Tredwell concludes that Jesus of Nazareth is a wholly mythical personage; that the Gospels were not written until after the biography of Apollonius, and that the various miracles and remarkable facts in the history of Jesus were worked up by the Christian evangelists from this biography, where they are found, in almost identical shape, related of Apollonius, who was, in the first three Christian centuries, worshipped in Greece and Asia Minor as an incarnate God; that the accepted date of the commencement of the Christian era is now admitted by all scholars to be four years out of the way, and that we actually date our era from the "year of our Lord Apollonius," who, instead of Jesus, was really born just eighteen hundred and seventy-nine years ago.

Other papers were read by Mr. Daniel G. Thompson on "Religious Pleasures and Pains," an exceedingly interesting and pleasing essay; by Mr. Wm. H. Boughton on "Abyssinia"; a thoughtful and suggestive essay by Rev. John W. Chadwick on "Agnostic Religion," in which he maintained that religion was somewhat distinct and apart from the ordinary dogmas and beliefs which are commonly associated with it, and that one might be essentially religious even if he could not accept such beliefs as that in the being of a personal God, or in a future life. It is impossible to do justice to Mr. Chadwick's able paper in a paragraph. It was thoroughly enjoyed and heartily appreciated by all who had the pleasure of listening to it.

Another paper of exceeding interest was that by Dr. Richard Dugdale, the author of "The Jukes Family," on his favorite subject, "The Heredity of Crime." The lecture was illustrated by a diagram, tracing the descent of this family of criminals from their criminal and degraded ancestors, and furnished a most powerful argument for pure and healthful parentage, and indirectly for charity toward those whose unfortunate environment, before and after birth, finds its necessary and logical result in their criminal lives.

Mr. Andrew McLean read a paper on Wordsworth, and Mr. Fred. B. Hawley, an interesting essay on "The Ratio of Capital to Consumption," showing much thought and originality of treatment. It is published in full in the July number of the National Quarterly Review. Another paper read before the club was that of Lewis G. Jones, published in THE INDEX of July 10, on "The Cuneiform Legends of Chaldea, and their Relation to the Early Hebrew Writings." The view therein presented, that many of the early stories of the Hebrew Scriptures were derived from older records in Assyria and Babylonia, wherein they were illustrative of an early solar mythology, was novel, but has since received support from the investigations of scholars in England and Germany. Prof. Sepp, of the University of Munich, accepting this fact, argues, in a series of articles now appearing in the Allgemeine Zeitung, that it necessitates the abandonment of the theory of inspiration for the Old Testament. An article of similar import has recently appeared in the London Times, and Sir Henry Rawlinson, the eminent oriental scholar, has announced his belief that the twelve cuneiform tablets containing the original of the Bible story of the flood constitute the record of a solar myth. In the Unitarian Review for July, Rev. S. J. Barrows has an interesting article—"Assyriology and the Bible"—tending to the same general conclusions.

One of the most interesting papers of the present season was read by Wm. M. Ivins, Esq., on "The Essential Principle of Archæal Law." He traced the origin of the leading principles of law in Rome and in India to its source in the primitive family relation and the religion of the family altar; showing, incidentally, that survivals of this far-off beginning still exist in the laws and customs even of the most civilized nations.

The limitations of this article admit of only a brief sketch of a few of the subjects which have been treated by the essayists of the Philosophical Club. No member is responsible in any way for the opinions of the writers, who are left free to express their best thoughts in such terms as they may choose. Many of the papers have given evidence of a great deal of thought and research, and the general influence of the meetings has certainly been liberalizing, and indicative of a tendency toward a higher culture. A community in which such an organization has grown up spontaneously, to meet a recognized want, cannot be devoid of intellectual life.

These meetings have involved but little expense, the essayists all contributing their time and efforts without pay, for their mutual benefit and the general good. The members and attendants are by no means limited to "agnostics" and those professing "liberal" religious views, but have had always a fair representation from members of "Orthodox" churches. Yet the tone of the papers has usually been liberal, even to radicalism. Such an association, and such meetings, cannot but be productive of much good; and this imperfect sketch of the Brooklyn Philosophical Club is presented to your readers in hope that it may induce other communities to form similar organizations. "As a man thinketh, so is he." To the degree that he thinks deeply, and wisely, and freely is he truly a MAN. Welcome, then, to all such aids in producing a nobler, braver, truer, and more manly generation of American citizens!

HISTORICALISM.

II.

It is worth while to cite authorities enough to show that the doctrine I have laid down about the right direction to travel in for the purpose of investigating historical truth is not a mere notion of my own. Baron Bunsen is recognized as a just and honest scholar and a man of high ability, even by those who do not accept all his conclusions; and none will deny his reverent spirit or his sincere uprightness of purpose. In the introduction to his well-known work, Egypt's Place in Universal History (p. 25), he says, evidently as a matter of course and without dreaming that there was any argument to be made in the question, "We shall commence, therefore, with the lowest point in general history" (i.e., the lowest for the purpose of investigating the chronology of Egypt), "the foundation of the Macedonian Empire, and proceed upwards in an unbroken line," etc.; and he goes on tracing out this line further and further back, to the Persian dominion, the Babylonian dominion, the first Olympiad, the dedication of Solomon's Temple, and so upward to Moses.

Professor Seeley, the eminent English scholar, in his investigation of the authenticity of the first book of Livy, remarks in the same matter-of-course way, that he "traces backward from the time of Livy"; and he proceeds (in a very summary manner) to do so.

Sir George Cornewall Lewis, more eminent as a historical investigator than Professor Seeley, and who is indeed, to a great extent, followed by Seeley in his work on Livy, lays it down in the same manner, as if it merely needed reference, in his well-known book on the Credibility of the Early Roman History (Vol. I., p. 19), that the way to best use the judgment in historical research is "to start from a period whose history is clearly founded upon contemporary evidence, and to recede until we find that the contemporary historians have deserted us." Thus, moreover, Lewis proceeds to do, and with excellent effect; and his book, as well as Seeley's, is, in consequence of this lucid and sensible mode of procedure, a most instructive work, not only as to the particular facts of the Roman history, but as to the right mental habits and methods for studying history generally.

The Rev. James Strong, D.D., the learned and able coadjutor of the late Dr. McClintock in the great Cyclopedia of Theology now in process of publication by the Harpers, published in the Methodist Quarterly Review for April and July, 1878, two very laboriously-prepared and ably-argued papers against the continuous or long Egyptian chronology, and in favor of a system of contemporaneous dynasties which would agree with the usual dates for Noah's flood. As a mode of investigating, Dr. Strong, as if by the mere necessity of a healthy mind, adopted the method of working backward towards antiquity.

"In our own scheme," he says (p. 469 in the July, 1878, number), "the chronology mounts, according to a simple process, from the fixed date, B.C. 989, when Shishak's twenty-first year has been made to coincide with Rehoboam's fifth, by the following steps"; and then the doctor goes on, mounting step by step, from one dynasty up to another, until he makes out his final date for King Menes. His conclusion, it is true, differs a good deal from Bunsen's; but as they were both men of good historic instincts, and intent on the clearest way to reach the truth, they adopted without any concert of action identically the same method.

Just the same is the rule laid down by Isaac Taylor in his excellent treatise on the History of the Transmission of Ancient Books to Modern Times. He explains (p. 6 of the second edition) that "In presenting to the reader what might be called the History of the Records of History, we shall put him in a position for tracing the extant works of ancient authors retrogressively" [his italics] "from modern times up to the age to which they are usually attributed; and then it will be seen on what grounds—under certain limitations—the contents of these works are admitted to be authentic and worthy of credit."

The eminently sound sense of all these authorities, except perhaps Bunsen, the very high character for both learning and uprightness of all of them, the deep religious character of nearly all, and the thorough Orthodoxy of several, render this unconscious consent in the practical use of this method, a weighty and I think conclusive mass of authority in its favor, if any authority were needed. But the very statement of the case will, I suppose, constitute the proof for most people. They will say, very likely, "Of course; did anybody ever suppose there was any other way?"

It may be well, however, for the sake of those who naturally philosophize on such matters, to just remind that this is simply the well-known elementary rule in all scientific investigations, of "proceeding from the known to the unknown." This is a truism, no doubt, in natural science; but the fundamental identity of method in that and historical investigation is not so trite a truth. "Discovery," says Gore, in his Art of Scientific Discovery (p. 9), "consists in passing from the known to the unknown." But it would be absurd to enlarge upon this.

And yet the historical procedure has been, almost invariably, ever since there was history, exactly the reverse,—to take the unknown and unknowable for granted and then to proceed from the unknown to the known. An analogous process was the compendious juridical method called of old, on the Scottish border, "Jeddart justice." It consisted in hanging your man promptly, and then ascertaining afterwards whether or no he was guilty. F. B. P.

THE INDIANS.

A Colorado correspondent of the Boston Advertiser gives expression to his views of the Indian question as follows:—

"For over one hundred years the United States has treated the Indians on one uniform system of wrong and injury, under the pretence of civilizing and Christianizing them. Putting them away on reservations far removed from civilized white people, they have been the victims of corrupt adventurers, who in most instances were refugees from justice in the States, who by their villainy cause the Indian tribes to believe that white people were scoundrels, and civilized life and Christianity a fraud.

"Now that their rights are to be respected, let their necessities, like those of the white man and colored man, be taken into consideration, and the march of improvement be opened to them as it is to others; teach them the benefits as well as the strength of civil laws; place them on the same footing in their Territory as citizens in the States, and more will be done toward civilizing them in ten years than has been done in one hundred years before. Grant to each head of a family his proportionate part of the land in fee which is now held in common, and let it descend to his heirs; grant the right of way for railroads through the Territory as in the States, establish telegraphs and mails, and in the contest with Yankee genius and energy he will yet become valuable to the nation as a citizen instead of a burthen as now. He will be freed from skulking thieves and bandits who now seek the seclusion of his reservation in order to cheat justice and the law. If his right to hold this Territory 'as long as water runs or grass grows' is to be respected, let his other wants be also respected. As well let a would-be suicide drown without help as to isolate these people and make their liberty a license for crime. Let the Congress grant railroads the bare right of way, and give the Indian a fee in his land, and provide courts to redress his wrongs and compel his obedience to law; and then the duty of the government will have been performed and the whole nation benefited. Railroads are true missionaries in this country."

THE INFLUENCE OF THE ENVIRONMENT.

The social order is the best corrective of much bad theology. The theology of our city churches does not differ much in terms from that of the Pocasset Adventists. But whereas their theology was all in all to them, our city church-goers read the daily papers, watch the slow progress of the bridge, ride on the elevated railroad, go with the multitude that keep holiday at Brighton and Manhattan, hear the "Pinafore" music, and so on. In our ordinary life the damaging force of the average pulpit preaching is largely neutralized by the amusements and distractions which compete with it for human interest, by the practical commentary of events and circumstances, which give an air of unreality and make-believe to popular theological conceptions. If men were everywhere shut up with these theological conclusions, if their characters were the result of their unmixed influence, we should have a thousand murders and other tragedies where now we have but one. A Pocasset horror would be an every-day occurrence. That there is not a reign of terror all the time, we have to thank not so much the preachers for their superior wisdom as the general order of society which neutralizes their irrational teaching.—Rev. J. W. Chadwick.

FOREIGN.

THE HOUSES of John Milton and of the famous Countess of Pembroke in Aldersgate Street, London, were recently pulled down.

PASCAL DUPRAT recently lectured on Free Trade to three thousand persons at Lyons, claiming that Free Trade is really a French doctrine, Frenchmen having preached it in the eighteenth century.

IN THE COURSE of the recent legal proceedings, it appears that when Cardinal Antonelli was ill, his relatives, instead of making a pilgrimage to Lourdes, consulted the famous materialist physician Raspail. —National Reformer.

A CROWDED MEETING of the Hull Radical Club was held on Tuesday, July 22. Mr. Billany gave an address on "The Causes of Distress," urging, among other things, intemperance among the people, our feudal land-system, and the foreign policy of the government as all tending to cause the present stagnation of trade. The lecturer was frequently interrupted by applause, and he received a hearty vote of thanks at the close. —Secular Review.

THE FRENCH CHAMBER on Monday agreed to the education estimates, ten thousand francs being voted for a new professorship of comparative mythology, after a protest from M. Blachère, who apprehended that it would serve as a medium for attacks on the Christianity professed by thirty-five million Frenchmen, at the instance of the eighty thousand who returned themselves in the census as of no religion. M. Blachère forgot that there are scores of thousands who are reckoned as professing Christians solely because they have not directly avowed their heresy. —National Reformer.

DR. CONGREVE, the eminent Positivist, says the National Reformer, in a little circular now before us, thus comments on the fulsome manner in which "society" professes to lament the untimely death of the Prince Imperial: "In a singularly unjust war Louis Napoleon chooses to join: accidentally he meets death. What justified his conduct? He was not fighting in defence of his country. He was not helping the weak against the strong. What motive, I say, not deserving of honor, but exempt from blame, can we find for him? The utmost that can be urged is, that he was young and craved action, and found war the easiest action, indifferent to the right or wrong of the case. He has, on this the most favorable supposition, paid a just penalty for his error. Our nation has no concern with him. Its respectful silence for a deep family sorrow I should have been glad to share; but we are called on for more. The nation has ample ground for sadness as it sees its blood and treasure poured out without any choice given it, or any choice given its soldiers, in a war forced on it by the insubordination of Sir Bartle Frere. It has ample cause for sadness in the moral weakness which keeps it from acknowledging and repairing its wrong. The death of one voluntary participant in that wrong may well leave it unmoved. It should be more moved by the death of any of those whom it is unjustly attacking. I omit all other considerations—all the social and national interests involved. I content myself with challenging the moral verdict of the nation on this death, which I fearlessly say should carry no honor, nothing but average human sympathy."

DIDN'T CARE ABOUT THE JOURNEY.—When Arsene Houssaye directed the Comedie-Francaise, a dramatic author submitted to the company a new play, which, he was convinced, would, etc. Before beginning to read it to the assembled societaires, the author made a brief explanatory speech as follows: "The better to comprehend and enter into the spirit of my play, it will be necessary for you to transport yourselves to England." "'S that so?" cried Houssaye, briskly; "then we must take time to pack up if we have such a journey before us, and in the meantime we will hear read some other plays which do not demand such extensive journeying. Le prochain! (Next!)" —Boston Times.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—as a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

LIBERAL LEAGUE PLATFORM

For the Presidential Election of 1880,

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

SIFTINGS.

A MAGAZINE has been started at Jerusalem (Palestine). It is to be issued quarterly, and will give special attention to the archaeological researches of that region.

THE FAMILIAR verses "When shall we three meet again?" are supposed to have been written by Sampson Occom, an Indian preacher and poet, over one hundred years ago.

"MORE BEAUTIFUL than all temples is that cottage where dwell justice, self-control, prudence, piety, proper regard for all duties, and knowledge of all that is human or divine."—Seneca.

THE THIRD ANNUAL CONVENTION of the New York State Freethinkers' Association is to be held this year at Chautauqua Lake, beginning Sept. 17 and continuing until the 21st.

THERE ARE TO-DAY in Massachusetts, it is said, about a dozen towns belonging almost exclusively to one person, or one company with whom rests the right and power to drive out of the town any operative who ventures to oppose the wishes of the landlord.

THOSE WHO ARE apprehensive in respect to the spread of Roman Catholicism in this country may find comfort in the assurance which recent statistics afford in respect to New England, where it is found to have merely kept pace with the increase of the foreign element of the population.

HERE IS AN "unconsidered trifle" worth reverting to. It appears in the Christian Union: "A congregation at Brenham, Texas, placed in the corner-stone of their new church, photographs of Jefferson Davis and other Confederate generals. This church has evidently gone back to original sin for a foundation."

THE PARIS MUNICIPALITY is effacing the royalist and imperialist names of streets, and substituting those more accordant with republican sympathies. Among the latter, there will be one in honor of Abraham Lincoln. This may be a good thing; but, under the circumstances, there is some reason to fear that, like other good things, there may be too much of it.

THE Jewish Times gives this advice to young men, which is worth pondering: "The greatest mistake that a young man can make is when he postpones marriage, squanders the vigor of his manhood, and thus becomes an old man before the allotted time. To remain youthful, vigorous, and prosperous, marry while you are young, and practice the precepts of Solomon, the Wise (Prov. v.), which the young, as well as the old, may profit by reading."

MRS. CHRISTIAN OLENSON, of Chicago, has demonstrated that woman may excel in the trades as well as in the more customary and lighter female occupations. The furniture of her house is the work of her own hands, and it is described as handsomely carved and deftly put together. Her husband is a cabinet-maker, but she is indebted chiefly to her father for instruction while in the old country, in the skill she has turned to so practical account.

THE COLORADO beetle, vulgarly called the potato-bug, has entered upon his European travels. At last account he had reached Ireland, where he was surprised in a vigorous investigation of the quality of its famous tuber. There seems to be a fair prospect that, in common with other distinguished Americans, he may be favored with many attentions. Indeed, it is safe to predict for him an unusually warm reception if he continues his tour of observation.

THESE ARE SOME of the questions of stupendous moment that are at present agitating the national Church of England: Whether a clergyman shall stand at the side or at the end of the altar in the communion service. Whether he shall wear a black tie or a white one. Whether the altar shall be lighted by gas or candles. Whether a bishop should consecrate in a sitting or a standing posture. They help to make plainer the one which Gladstone asked two or three years ago. "Is the English Church worth preserving?"

TO-DAY SCORNFUL priests say Garrison did nothing. He was only a stumbling-block in the way. His bitterness only hindered the movement, and his criticism of the Church put off success for twenty years. When free speech cost something, and claims for justice angered the nation almost to slaying the speaker, then timid Church and party hid themselves from all responsibility for the agitation, and left Garrisonianism to keep the movement alive. The work done, the tempest over, fair-weather sailors stalk forth to doubt if there were, after all, any storm, or even any rough sea, but what the pilot raised.—Wendell Phillips.

THE FOLLOWING amusing version is given of the origin of the word "monk." A pious beggar had wandered about in the world so long that his garments fell away from his body. In this plight he was met by the devil, who bestowed on him a piece of coarse cloth in which the pious man arrayed himself, and fastened it around him with a cord. He wandered until he came back to his native village. No one recognized him, but a herd of cattle by the wayside lowed in a friendly manner "muh-muh." Though the devil created the first monk, the village cattle christened him. The lowing "muh" became first "munch" and then "monk."—Milwaukee Free-Press.

AN ARTICLE will be found in the usual place of the essay, and a communication in the editorial department of the present issue of THE INDEX, of peculiar interest on account of the far distant source from whence they come. They are from natives of India. The former was received a few weeks since from St. Petersburg, and was dated June 4, 1879. It bore the imprint "Kali Das Chakravarti, the Adh Brahmo Soma Press." "With the best compliments of the 'Hindu Youth.'" The other reached us a few days ago, via London, and is, as will be seen, a letter to the Free Religious Association. It tells its own story. They indicate that the higher intelligence of the remote section of the world from whence they emanate shares in the same intellectual influences that are operative among the most advanced civilizations. They show, also, how kindredship of ideas and aspirations serves to establish a unity of fellowship among those widest apart in space, and of the most different races and climes.

IT WOULD SEEM as though Fall River is having rather more than its share of brilliant examples of the union of religion and dishonesty. Three of its late "highly respectable and influential citizens," within a few months past have been sent to the State prison, and now two others from the same class have a like prospect before them. George B. Durfee confesses to having abstracted from the Mechanics Mill Company the sum of $35,000. Mr. Walter Paine, Durfee's brother-in-law, went in deeper. His figures are from $100,000 to $200,000. We do not know whether Mr. Paine had in view a desire to lend what he thus obtained to the Lord, or to render him greater service; but this much appears, that he was a very active Baptist church-member, a former president of the Young Men's Christian Association, and greatly absorbed in bringing the young to Christ through Sabbath and mission schools. And these are the men who, while they live in the luxury which other people's money procures, cannot afford to add a fraction of a dollar to the scanty day's wages of those who toil for them; and refuse even to confer with them in respect to their grievances. Is it any wonder that Fall River is noted for labor strikes?

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

Political Liberty,

AND THE BEST MEANS FOR ITS ATTAINMENT BY THE NATIVES OF INDIA.

BY A HINDU YOUTH,
NOW RESIDING IN EUROPE.

From the few quotations which the Calcutta correspondent of the Times lately made from some native journals, it is easy to see that there is at least a spirit of bold speculation amongst the educated natives of India. They seem already to have caught, at least partially, that spirit of independence which is such a characteristic of all European nations, especially of the Teutonic races. India, even in the days of her glorious past, has been said by no less an authority than Professor Max Müller to have been not particularly prominent in this feeling: political interests were alien to a people who directed all their energies to the problems of life and death or to those which concern man's relation to "The All," as the Vedantic Rishis would express it. It is therefore a very hopeful sign, a feeling which it is impossible to notice without sincere delight, that India is also taking into herself a spirit of political liberty; and if it be laid at the door of England that she has done nothing but impoverish India, this creating, as it were, a new element in the Indian national life must at least be recorded in her favor. Granted that England's monarchy in India has verily been that which Mr. Bright in his late Manchester speech attributed to her, granted that all the rhetorical epithets which that eloquent statesman applied were subject to no qualification, has not England at least done this one thing for India which the Mohammedans, not to say anything of the Greeks, were incapable of doing in their sway of one thousand years? And how long is it that England has reigned in India? A century—no more. Nay, her proper reign might be said to have begun only since half a century. Is not that at least an auspicious beginning?

But however one might congratulate India and her young patriots on their growing feeling of national independence, however one might sympathize with their just and laudable enthusiasm for the rights of their country, there is nevertheless a different side of this matter which it is essential to bring home to them. National liberty is an object which every individual is bound to strive after and fight for. But there are certain conditions which we regard as essential,—inevitable to its realization. And therefore the question of the most essential importance is: Are the modern patriots of India endeavoring to fulfil those conditions, or are they venting their patriotism merely in diatribes and sonnets to liberty, in patriotic associations, or in such sensational journalistic productions as those extracts which were alluded to in the beginning? Do the modern patriots of India really think they shall be able to do much in the way of their national independence merely by such literary efforts, unless at the same time accompanied by those practical means which it is the object of such efforts to give an impulse to? Not that we do not know how to value earnestness of soul. It has its great value; but what we contend for—and we simply repeat what we have said above—is, that there are certain inevitable conditions which alone entitle a nation to political independence or endow it with the might, and hence with the right, of governing itself. It is necessary to be clearer. Our studies in history and its cognate branches have gradually brought us to the conviction that the Law of Natural Selection whose action is so fearfully prominent in the vegetable and animal worlds obtains equally in human society, with scarcely any perceptible modification. And we all know what that law means. It means that only the fittest deserve to, and will, survive; and by the fittest, Nature seems to mean, in the first place, the strongest in body and soul. She seems to abhor the weak and the imbecile no less than the fancied vacuum of old, and her proceeding with them is one of total annihilation or of merited degradation to the position they should justly occupy. Only he dares speak of right or rights who has might, exclaims she in her Book of Revelation which we term History. And if man—foolish man, misled either by metaphysical subtleties or theological fancies, misreads that book—refuses to listen to Nature's solemn audible voice across the dust of empires and the din of centuries,—oh! then she knows well enough how to flog her truant child back to his proper senses, and her admonitions are not quite those of a caressing Bengal mother, but consist, as we all know, in fearful convulsive revolutions, until Rome finds her Caesar, England her Cromwell, and France her Napoleon (not of course "Le Petit"). In these, Nature once more asserts her eternal law, once more gives the hero who reigns, not by the so-called right of conventional inheritance, but of might, which alone gives you the right. The imbeciles and weaklings, or, worse still, the sham-heroes, who brought the nation to its miserable plight are scattered to the winds by her volcanic force, the almost inundating lava-streams of the people's blood are stemmed, and look how the nation blooms and flourishes once more under the sway of its just, rightful king, because chosen by Nature on account of his acknowledged might and therefore his inviolable right to rule. (See the very well-known works: 1. Mommsen's Geschichte Roms; 2. Carlyle's Cromwell's Letters and Speeches; and 3. Thiers' Histoire du Consulat.) And what the great philosophical historians we have just named have so conclusively proved by an immense mass of facts and the rare force of their logical powers in the case of individual men, holds equally good in the case of individual nations whose community forms the human race. Here, also, it is the most heroic that should reign, the wisest and the strongest that should rule; and abundant blessings flow to the conquered in spite of the bloody resistance they might offer, or curses and imprecations they might heap on their hated conquerors. Read only what David Hume says on the effects of the Roman conquest in Britain; and if you will appeal to the facts of universal history (Weltgeschichte) you will be convinced that similar effects have taken place in all countries and in all climes,—all the more in proportion to the higher civilization of the conquering and the wie teachableness of the conquered. Nay, history proves more: It proves that even if the conquering race occupy an inferior scale of civilization, even if it be destitute of those arts and sciences which are generally recognized as the inevitable concomitants of a civilized life, and has no other qualities to recommend itself than manly courage, abounding energy, and undisguised frankness, its hammering down the tottering remnants of a highly civilized but exceedingly corrupt nation is of rare service to humanity as a whole. It is hardly necessary to allude to those whom we mean. We mean, of course, the Franks, the Goths and the Vandals: those "barbarians of the North" who battered down the effete civilization of the Roman Empire. If the all-sweeping, all-devastating Mongolic hordes had not once, under their well-known leaders, overspread, locust-like, all the countries lying between Pekin and Moscow, Punjab and Silesia, we should have been deprived of those exemplary Mogul rulers whose great memories we must cherish with perpetual gratitude, and who conferred blessings of civilization on our land to which every street, nay every mouldering stone of Delhi, Agra, and Lucknow, still bears a magnificent and touching witness. We mean, of course, our Baber, our Akbar (Glory to his name,—perhaps the very beau-ideal of a ruler, and hence also of any man that has ever lived!), and our Shahjehan rulers, in whose presence we feel as if we were before our Rama, Vikramaditya, and Chandragupta.

If such be, then, the verdict of universal history, if such be Nature's inexorable law, it is meet that we, the Hindus, should recognize it in due time, and try to wrest out of Fate all the good she is able to yield. And if, without allowing ourselves to be hurried away by the impetuosity of a blind patriotism which we are afraid has begun to infect the rising generation of India, we should calmly and thoughtfully weigh the facts as they are, we should come to the conclusion that for India no other foreign conquest could be more favorable, more suited to supply her with all that she most needs, than that of England. And what is it that our country stands most in need of? Certainly: (1) Industry, (2) Commerce, (3) Political Spirit, and above all (4) the Physical Sciences. These, we say, are the crying needs of India,—needs which must be met, or we must perish most miserably—like Peru or Mexico. And those who have taken most pains to study what India once was, and what a hot-bed of famine, pestilence, ignorance, superstition, and brutality she now is, will accede most to this opinion; as, for example, that gifted nobleman who, with a discrimination proportionate to his good-will, holds now the rudder of our government. In a speech which His Excellency delivered near the beginning of his gracious reign (it was, we believe, before the Convocation of the Calcutta University), he observed that what India wanted was not metaphysical philosophy but physical science, for he strongly suspected that the Hindus might even excel the Europeans in the subtleties of their dialectical ingenuity. (the words may not be quite exact, for we quote from memory). And what His Excellency said about dialectical skill, he might have said with still greater truth about philology, poetry, and religion. How extremely valuable were the achievements of the ancient Hindus in all these branches of knowledge, is well known to every European who is acquainted with the chefs-d'œuvre of the eminent savants who began their work of enlightenment (ex oriente lux) a century ago under Jones and Colebrooke, and are now so worthily represented by men like Max Müller and Albrecht Weber. Though transferred from one political slavery to another, India has nevertheless continued to dominate by far the greatest part of Asia, by the rare vigor and the abundant richness of her spiritual life. And what the Hindu mind has been doing for long, long centuries for China, Japan, Thibet, Mongolia, and Siberia, for Burmah, Siam, and some of the islands of the neighboring archipelago, it has now begun to do for Europe, if we are to interpret it by the influence which it has already exercised on some of her most cultured minds and acknowledged leaders of thought. Max Müller never speaks of our language, of its influence on philological science, of our "divine" grammarian Panini, but in words of rapturous enthusiasm; and those who would measure the influence of our poetical literature on some of the greatest poets and poetical philosophers of Europe need only recollect the well-known eulogic words of Goethe, Schlegel, Rückert, and the Humboldts, not to forget at the same time that noble Italian, Gozzano, who, in his Introduction to the Ramayana, evinces such a rare kinship to our pious and poetical ancestors. Passing by the voluminous works of the Orientalists themselves, like Burnouf, Stanislas Julien, Foucaux, and others,—of popular exponents, like Köppen and St. Hilaire,—the influence of Buddhism on the religious and philosophical thought of Europe, which has but just begun, is best gauged by referring to the works of one solitary thinker, who, whether we agree with his opinions or not, is certainly exercising a vast influence, not only on the rising generation of his own land, but on the civilized world. We mean, of course, Arthur Schopenhauer, whose pages abound with extracts from Buddhist literature, and whose Weltanschauung seems to have been so considerably influenced by the teachings of the Prophet of Kapilavastu. Thus it is not dialectics nor philology nor poetry and religion that we need; nay, as it would seem, we have enough of them, not only for ourselves, but even to spare a good deal for our neighbors. What, then, are our real and inevitable needs? Certainly that which Lord Lytton so wisely urged in his speech before the Convocation; namely, Physical Science. Yes, Physical Science is that which we verily want, and let us add also—Commerce, Industry, and Political Spirit. Now, could we be thrown in contact with a nation worthier to supply us with all these? What other nation could boast of greater progress in Science, of more extensive and successful Commerce, of more efficient Industry, and of freer Political Institutions more normally developed than England? What other nation, we ask, can count more universally acknowledged leaders of Science than Bacon, Newton, Darwin (Charles); more successful representatives of Commerce than the company which, beginning with small sea coast factories, gradually established an empire greater than even that of Asoka or Akbar; more efficient leaders of Industry than Arkwright, Watt, and Stephenson; and worthier heroes of Political Liberty than the fathers of the Magna Charta, down to their worthy successors, the Hampdens, the Pymes, the Elliots, the Miltons, and the Sidneyes of a later age? If such be our veritable needs, and such the nation with which we have by a concurrence of rare circumstances been brought into such intimate inextricable relations, what is it that we, the Hindus, should direct our efforts to do? Certainly to learn from our rulers, and through them from the whole civilized world, in a spirit of wise teachableness, all that they have to teach us. And what England and Europe have to teach us is verily what we most lack, as has already been intimated. We should therefore do all we can to cultivate and master the Physical Sciences,—make the most of those opportunities of acquiring them which have now been placed at our disposal. In the first place, direct all our energies to be a scientific "nation" under the guidance of the master-minds of Europe, and then we should have everything else we want. The growth of Commerce and Industry shall go hand in hand with the growth of Science: they are twin-sisters—inseparable companions. And does not India, of all countries in the world, demand that her children should particularly occupy themselves with Science—should know the vast incomparable physical resources she possesses, that these may be developed and utilized as much as possible? What other country has ever been so proverbially noted for the fertility of its soil and the exuberance of its natural productions? What other country can boast of minerals, plants, and animals more precious, more abundant and more diversified; of rivers wider and more navigable, mountains higher in altitude and richer in productions, coasts more extensive or more suited to the establishment of trading factories and efficient shipping? The material resource of our country, its fabulous richness, "the wealth of India," has attracted foreign nations, either as merchants or invaders, from time beyond mind. The first Mohammedan conquerors carried away its gold and diamonds in masses and not in pieces. We therefore owe it to our rarely gifted country to study the Physical Sciences, to know what physical resources she has, utilize them as much as possible, and thus open the way to the highest development of our commercial and political interests. And in the broad daylight of scientific research shall pass away those gloomy spectres which now cause so much terror and agony to our minds, pestilence and famine, yellow fever and epidemic, with their attendant evils, shall pass away. No less shall those grim superstitions and ghastly usages pass away which are hardly less fatal in their consequences than the evils mentioned above. And if there be, further, any truth in the assertion made by almost all great Orientalists without exception, that the Hindus have a mystical, unpractical tendency of mind, nothing is so likely to cure us of the same as a thorough acquaintance with the physical phenomena of Nature and the orders of sequence which there invariably follow. Thus Science—that which our present wise and beneficent ruler has already proposed—seems to be the chief remedy—yes, the panacea—for all the frightful maladies which our dear country is so intensely suffering from. Following, then, his advice, let us direct our efforts to a thorough cultivation, and as much as possible to a wide diffusion, of Science. It is Science, it is "culture" in the German sense of that word, that should now engage our best energies, in order that we may in due time reap its golden fruits; which are national prosperity, national liberty, and, as the full mature outcome of all, a free, vigorous, and noble national literature. Do you think if we deserve liberty—that is to say, if we have slowly but surely developed those conditions which alone entitle a nation to that grand golden privilege—England would be willing to withhold us from it? England,—the land of free political institutions, the home of noble, heroic patriots? Then must she be untrue to the deepest, the holiest instincts of her soul; then must she be utterly faithless to the noblest of her traditions and the most cherished of her spiritual experiences. If she might indeed ever go down so low,—if, foregoing all that which makes her voice to-day so much respected in all countries, infuses such strong confidence into all nations fallen or about to fall, she should one day be so despicably corrupt a black-guard,—then would she be no more capable of holding us in bondage than the later Roman emperors their Asiatic Empire or the statesmen of George the Third's reign a century ago their noble, heroic, Puritanic brothers across the Atlantic. We should then assert our just rights in spite of all English Cæsars, and certainly with the living sympathy of the whole civilized world for us and its unmitigated execrations for them. Let us, then, in the first place do all we can,—make use of all our present opportunities to deserve liberty, and we shall—must have it. But if, instead of trying to deserve liberty by the adoption of those practical means which we have indicated above, we would permit ourselves to indulge in vituperative, scurrilous journalism or in seditious, incendiary brochures, in descending with frothy, extravagant grandiloquence on the supposed dotage and the consequent imbecility of England, we should only provoke our rulers, we should only tighten our chains, we should only deserve to be treated as all conquered and disloyal races have ever been. They might treat us as our Aryan fathers treated the aborigines of India (Sudras), as the Dorian conquerors treated the original inhabitants of Greece (Hælots), as the Romans treated their foreign, and especially their Asiatic, prisoners (slaves and gladiators), as Charlemagne, otherwise so humane, was compelled to treat the Saxons under Witikind, as the Anglo-Saxons treated the Britons, as the Normans treated the Anglo-Saxons, and the compound of both—that is to say, the English—treated not long ago the inhabitants of Ireland. Nay, the most significant as well as the most touching instance of the kind is afforded by a people who, gifted, courageous, and patriotic beyond the ordinary run, have nevertheless ceased to have national existence, and are now exiles and emigrants in all parts of Europe, if not the whole world. We mean, of course, the Poles, whose history is full of unmistakable warning to all, especially to us in our present circumstances. Our "Hindu patriots" should seriously reflect on all these instances, especially on the last, to draw lessons of wise conduct from them. If they are silly enough to fancy that the British Lion has grown old and therefore imbecile, they should, at the same time, never forget that a lion, even on his death-bed, is capable of putting to flight, nay, tearing to pieces, whole herds of sheep and cows, of cowards and dastards who have neither the strength of individuality nor the power of unanimity. It is not the number, but the quality, of those who make a nation. The number of men who founded the Athenian, the Roman, and the Florentine Republics—the number of men who fought for and developed the English Constitution—would sink into utter insignificance before those vast, unwieldy masses which encumber the fertile plains of India. Compare only the two hundred millions of your Indian population and the twenty millions of that brave, energetic people who inhabit England (we except Wales). An American hero (of course of the North), Theodore Parker, once said that one Socrates was worth all the South Carolina States. One Rajpoot, one Sikh, one Hindoo, or one Maharatti is worth more than one thousand of your typical Bengali Baboo in his costume du chef de cuisine—fit only to make brilliant speeches and write seditious feuilletons. Ten and seven horse-men under an ill-formed fanatical slave came in by the front-door, and your bona fide Bengali Rajah went out in peace (Santia) by the back-door, in order that no injury might be done to any living creature—no disturbance might take place in the feeling of Universal Maitre! What a strikingly humiliating contrast to those deeds of stirring heroism which our Ramayana and our Mahabharata celebrate, as does no less our Chandi,—the greatest and the noblest of our modern Hindu poets,—in his immortal poem! Read—read those grand epics of old and the "Prithiraj Charita," and you will see how low, how despicably low, you have fallen."

We should therefore try to improve the quality of our number, for of quantity we have enough and to spare. If, then, we have the real interests of our country at heart,—if we are not mere declamatory lip-patriots, but patriots in the sense in which Hampden was once in England, Washington a century ago in America, Thiers but yesterday in France, Bismarck now in Germany,—we should direct all our present efforts to master the Physical Sciences, to develop the vast and the various resources of our gifted country as much as possible, to learn and introduce from Europe its Science, Industry, Commerce, Political Spirit, to remedy all those grave flaws which are to be detected in the most diversified ramifications of our national life; and when we have slowly but surely (for the process must be, as every process of development must be, necessarily slow) developed all those inevitable conditions which alone entitle a nation to liberty, we will have it, because we deserve it. Until that time we must be content with such definition of justice, or rather of England's justice to India, as Sir F. J. Stephen, in his late long letter to the Times, condescended to enunciate. We are children, and must therefore be treated as such. If we would foolishly give ourselves the airs of manhood, we should simply make ourselves ridiculous, or, worse still, should be flogged back into surly obedience. Or if we be found quite incorrigible, we should be treated as all incorrigible children once were under the old Spartan law,—we should be utterly exterminated, without even a trace to tell our wretched tale. That whole races can be exterminated, is a fact quite credible to those who are acquainted with what great historians relate about the Red Indians of America, about the aboriginal inhabitants of Peru and Mexico (see among others Draper's History of the Intellectual Development of Europe), and about many other races whose simple existence we are now able to conjecture only as the zoölogists do that of those half-reptilian and half-aërial Mesozoic Sauria, or that gigantic Pigeon called Dodo (didus inæptus—the very name tells you why it was extinct), or that of those well-known Mammoths and Mastodons of the Tertiary Period. We should therefore be wise in due time if we are not to share a similar fate; we should constantly remember and act up to the old adage, "First deserve and then desire."

FONTAINEBLEAU, Feb. 10, 1878.

SCHOOL SUFFRAGE FOR WOMEN.

It may interest your readers to know some of the things which have been done to forward the registering of women. The work thus far has been preparatory and quiet, but there has been neither indifference nor idleness on the part of the friends of the new movement, and the results will be sure to appear later. There are about three hundred and forty towns in Massachusetts. A circular has been sent to the town clerk in each town where active friends were not known to be at work, asking the names of one or more persons who would aid in informing and helping women to timely registration. Within a week from the time of mailing these circulars, more than a hundred answers were returned by the town clerks, all of them respectful, and most of them with the information that was needed. Every mail brings more replies. Circulars of instructions and forms of application for assessment are sent to the persons named by the town clerks. Replies are coming from these persons, all of them cordial, some of them exultant. By this plan, nearly the whole State will be reached.

A little later, it is proposed to hold mass meetings in some of the large centres. Meantime, many towns are organized, and will no doubt be able to report a full vote by women. Women who wish to be assessed have been hindered in various ways. In the first place, there were assessors who, when application was made to them, did not even know a new law had given women the right to vote. This occasioned delay while the assessors informed themselves. In such cases, the applicant had to go more than once. Then there was an impression that a woman could vote for school-committee by the payment of one dollar poll-tax; and while that question was unsettled women waited. Lack of information and misunderstanding have been in the way. For instance, last week in one of our cities a woman whose husband had deceased within a year took the receipted tax-bill, which she had paid after his death, and the paper containing her appointment as executrix, to the assessors. The tax bill had been made out in the name of the deceased husband, and paid by his widow, in whose hands the whole property now remains. It was a mixed question. The assessors sent her to the registrar, and the registrar told her she must go back to the assessors. The final result was that she went home without being assessed or registered. These are some of the hindrances, and they are such as never come in the

* Those who cannot understand the "Prithiraj Charita" in its grand original, which is in old Hindi, are requested to read, by all means, Todd's "Rajasthan," where considerable materials have been drawn from our great bard's poem,—although it is curiously suggestive that so many of us should read English, and some of us even French, so well, and our own Hindi or Hindia (hence its name) so ill, or probably not at all!

I have no means of knowing how many women have registered or been assessed in the State. But I do know that quiet work, well supported, is steadily going on. As an example, you published last week "An Appeal to the Women of Boston Highlands," in which the name of Edward Everett Hale stood first in a list of six clergymen, and that of Dr. Henry A. Martin stood first in a list of five physicians. In the Dorchester District, four clergymen and one physician unite with the work there; one of the ministers said, in a public meeting, he hoped he should meet all the women then present at the polls. In Mendon, the Rev. George F. Clark took the lead in preparing and sending out instructions to women. In Cambridge, the Rev. A. P. Peabody and Professor Benjamin Peirce, of Harvard College, give active support and help to the movement. In Ward 23, "young republicans" have earnestly proffered their help. In East Boston, South Boston, Chelsea, Malden, Stoneham, Hyde Park, Lynn, Plymouth, and Concord, the work is well begun and is in good hands. In Weymouth, one of the assessors, Mr. Elias Richards, has made a special list, using the word "her," so that there may be no mistake. In Westfield, twenty-two leading women called a meeting to interest the new voters in that city, and all along the line, from Nantucket, which moved early, there is quiet, steady preparation, not the less effective because it is not noisy. We shall know the result after the election. In the meantime, newspapers can render immeasurable and invaluable assistance by friendly coöperation with this beneficent opening to women to an influence in the schools where their children are to have the training which will influence their whole lives.—Lucy Stone, in Boston Advertiser.

A TALK WITH RENAN.

M. Renan, the distinguished French scholar and author, has had a conversation with a correspondent of the London Whitehall Review. He lives on the second floor of a spacious old hotel at No. 16 Rue St. Guillaume, Paris. "As I entered his bright, airy study, the other morning," says the reporter, "the vast power which a strong, clear, enthusiastic intelligence can exercise over the world struck me most forcibly; for the benevolent and affable old gentleman who so kindly greeted me, and apologized for not being able, by reason of rheumatism, to rise, was one who had endeavored, and with some success, to destroy a faith which has been cherished by the majority of cultivated beings ever since the beginning of the world,—a belief in the divine and supernatural. Let no one imagine that the great opponent of Christianity has anything of the cynicism of a Voltaire about him. No man is more human and kindly than M. Renan; and his sympathy for men is as true and sincere as his distrust in divinity. Personally, there is nothing remarkable to notice in him, except, perhaps, his kind, genial smile, and the brilliant, sharp glance of his eyes, which has penetrated through mountains of manuscript and inscription to get at the secret of truth. Our chat, naturally, at the beginning turned on the events of the day, and he said, speaking of the late terrible tragedy in Africa, 'I cannot see how you are responsible for the calamity.' The prince's courageous death was but the natural result of imprudence and hot youth, and there is, to my mind, nobody to blame in the matter."

"In a few moments I announced frankly to him the object of my maternal visit, and told him that I had come to him, as the greatest authority on the subject, to ask his opinion on the present condition of religious thought among the lower classes in France,—one of the most vitally important questions of the day."

"I will give you my opinion with the greatest pleasure," answered the great savant. "It is a pleasure to converse with you, and I will as readily discuss that subject with you as any other." He leant back in his chair and reflected for a moment, and then began: "The lower classes in France are distinctly positivists and freethinkers. The working classes in towns are still more,—they are anti-clerical. In the country the peasants are simply sceptical; but in the towns there is a deep-rooted dislike to all that savors of the priesthood."

"Surely this is a production of modern times?" I suggested.

"No," said M. Renan. "This is not a growth of yesterday, although, of course, such a phase of thought naturally takes time to develop. The French workman will not believe in the supernatural. Speak to him of angels,—'Who has ever seen them?' he will ask, 'and what influence can we directly trace to them?' Speak to him of prayer, and he will ask, 'Prove to me that prayer has ever been of any avail.' No," continued M. Renan, with a smile, "the French workman is distinctly a positivist, and only trusts to his own common-sense. The way in which this scepticism has spread is, of course, simple enough,—by conversation; and this is the reason why it is not so fully developed in the country as in the town. In the country a laboring man lives more or less an isolated life, whereas in the great centres men are gregarious, and conversation and argument naturally promulgate theories and ideas."

"Is not the Parisian populace more sceptical than that of other towns?" I inquired.

"No; it is the same in all the towns of France. The working classes deny all that is miraculous and supernatural, and have a deep-rooted dislike to the clergy."

"Surely this must have a very bad moral tendency?"

"No, I don't think so," said the great philosopher. "We find constantly that what we thought absolutely indispensable we can really get on very well without; and there can be no doubt that the lower classes in France to-day are infinitely more moral than they were formerly. Take, for instance, the department I know best,—that of Seine et Marne. Looking at the Assize Calendar, one is at first shocked at the great number of crimes and offences; but on inquiry one discovers that in former days there were infinitely more, only then they were not punished, and consequently not recorded and commented on."

"But the Celt is essentially romantic, superstitious, and sentimental. Without a God, where can he find a vent for these sentiments?"

"We have had much of our sentimentality worn out of us," replied M. Renan, with a sad smile, "and have become very practical."

"The French Revolution was doubtless the cause of this," I observed.

"In a great measure, no doubt; but then, see, some of the leading men were not atheists. Robespierre, for example, was a deist, believed in a primary and a divine cause, in future life,—in a word, in the supernatural. So did St. Just."

"But the lower classes, when they proclaim themselves positivists, can hardly understand the meaning of the word?"

"Of course they do not understand it in its full sense. Their theory is not the elaborate theory of Auguste Comte, who founded a school, or, more properly speaking, a church. They merely trust to their common-sense, and their common-sense revolts at the idea of miracles and the supernatural. In seaport towns, however, among sailors, who are constantly at the mercy of chance and unforeseen accident, there still lingers some superstition and some belief in the supernatural; but among the rest of the lower classes of France, there is absolutely no such belief remaining."

"Is there no hope or chance of a religious belief inspiring the French again?"

"I hardly think so," said M. Renan. "Father Hyacinthe might have some chance, but there is too much of the priest about him for the multitude to adopt his precepts. You see he still celebrates mass. His scheme will, I fancy, not enjoy a very long life, although, from what I hear, his church is well attended. An eloquent preacher, with just sufficient idealism, but not too much, and no superstition, might perhaps prevail; but I almost doubt it. A complete and entire disbelief in the supernatural is too deeply rooted in the minds of all the working classes of France to be easily eradicated. What is really the most to be regretted in the condition of these classes in towns is their dislike to marriage, and their marked tendency to endeavor to escape from such social duties and obligations." Here there was a pause, and then M. Renan resumed: "But as regards what you ask me,—my opinion as to the condition of religious belief among the lower classes of France to-day,—I can only say that their scepticism and their disbelief in the supernatural are profound. As I have said before, the workman trusts to his own common-sense, and will not merely believe a legend because it is told him, and if he cannot find in his own experience some proof that it is true."

"These remarks having closed the subject, I turned to other matters, and asked M. Renan if what I had heard was true, i.e., that some of the leaders of the late Commune were men of real ability. He laughed and shook his head. 'No; none of them. I knew La Cécilia personally. He was simply a madman. Raoul Rigault had capacity, but capacity for evil.'"

"And Flourens?" I inquired.

"Ah! Flourens was one of the most worthy of all," M. Renan remarked. "He, at least, was brave and enthusiastic. He is, perhaps, more to be pitied than blamed."

"Just at this juncture breakfast was announced, and I took my leave of the great savant, who warmly invited me to come again to see him in the autumn, and kindly offered to take me to the Academy some day, to be present at a séance of the immortal forty."

ADVANTAGES OF A MECHANICAL EDUCATION.

In this age of iron and steam, the young man who thoroughly understands the nature and manipulation of the former, and the scientific and practical management and application of the latter, need not long be without lucrative employment; provided, of course, he has the moral and physical qualifications for a position of responsibility and trust. While it is true that a large number of the prosperous manufacturers and contractors of this country have never had the advantages of a so-called technical education, such as is afforded by a mechanical college, yet the day is fast approaching, when, as now in Europe, our large industrial establishments, and our boards of public works, will demand a scientific and technical education of the men who direct these undertakings.

As our country grows older, men will pay more and more attention to an education which fits them for some definite pursuit in life, and their entire educational course will be framed with this particular object in view. A bent for mechanical pursuits usually manifests itself at a very early period in life; the inclination of the six-year-old boy to hammer and pound, to tear open toys and clocks to "see what makes 'em go," all so annoying to the careful parent, may be taken as indications of latent constructive genius, although now manifested in a very destructive form.

In the youth, the mechanical bias becomes still more apparent, manifesting itself in attempts to construct wagons, boats, gig-saws, small engines, etc. With such a boy, a mechanical education is no doubtful experiment; talk to him about it, and he wants to go to a mechanical college at once, where he may learn to be indeed and in truth a competent mechanical engineer.

Just at this point, well-meaning parents, in order to fulfil some preconceived plan, or to do what seems to them prospective of most good for the son, endeavor to force him into some other line or profession, and thus make a third-rate lawyer, doctor, or merchant out of a boy who would have certainly made a first-rate mechanic. Of course, there is a vast difference between a merely whimsical tinkerer and a youth with undoubted mechanical proclivities; and an observing parent or experienced teacher would have no difficulty in making the distinction. A few queries put by a judicious technical educator would soon reveal the young man's inherent prejudices, and enable him to judge whether the candidate possessed a promising foundation for a mechanical education.

Such a foundation consists mainly in an aptitude for mathematics, a good idea of form and construction, a ready insight into mechanical movements, a positive love for machine manipulation, and a tendency to improve every possible opportunity to witness machinery in motion, coupled with a desire to see into and learn its office and applications.

The above is from Leffel's News, to which the editor adds: "There are numerous excellent institutions in this country in which a youth of the character we have described can get the education requisite to develop his natural powers, and to fit him to fill a useful and profitable position in the field of practical mechanics; to enter the list as an inventor, or, in time, to superintend important public works."

Among these institutions might be named Columbia College, New York City; Stevens Institute of Technology, Hoboken, New Jersey; Cornell University, Ithaca, New York; Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, Troy, New York; Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio; and Illinois Industrial University, Champaign, Ill. All of these institutions publish catalogues giving schedule of studies, terms of tuition, cost of living, etc.

Of the students recently graduated from one of the above named institutions,—the Stevens Institute of Technology,—one is now engaged in a steam-heating and ventilating establishment; another has a position on the Michigan Southern Railway; another is employed as instructor in the Institute; another as a consulting engineer; another in the Midvale Steel Works; another as assistant editor of a technical publication; another in the Franklin Paper Mills; another in the engineer corps of the United States Navy; another in the car-shops of the Pennsylvania Railway; another in the manufactory of brick machinery; another as professor of engineering at Yeddo, Japan; another at ship-building works in St. Petersburg, Russia, and another on a survey and exploration of the Western Territories.

The course in the institution just named is somewhat exacting, as indeed it must be to turn out men capable of filling such positions as we have named; but the earnest student has the advantage of association with those who are as enthusiastic as himself, and, as he gets into the higher classes, the dilettanti drop out, and those who have in them the stuff out of which competent and successful mechanical engineers are made move forward to graduation, and go out to assume the duties of their vocation thoroughly prepared for their life work.—Scientific American.

FAMILIAR POEMS.

HOW LONGFELLOW WROTE SOME OF HIS POPULAR FAVORITES.

Longfellow's poems are as familiar to all instructors as the language of the school-room. Every school-boy reads and declaims them. We once passed an evening with Professor Longfellow, during which he gave us an account of the origin of his most popular poems. We will give the history of those which are most common to the "readers" and "speakers." The "Psalm of Life" is probably the best known of these numerous school poems. It was written on a summer morning in 1838. He was a young man then, full of aspiration and hope, and the poem was merely an expression of his own feelings. He regarded it as a personal matter, like an entry in one's journal, and for a long time refrained from publishing it. Mr. Longfellow related that, on returning from his visit to the queen, an English laborer stepped up to the carriage and asked to shake hands with the writer of the "Psalm of Life." "It was one of the best compliments I ever received," said the democratic poet.

Longfellow's study is a repository of the beautiful things of the past: souvenirs, busts of noble friends, mementos of departed poets,—Tom Moore's waste-paper basket, Coleridge's inkstand, a piece of Dante's coffin. In this study stood an old clock, with the colorings of age, rising from floor to ceiling. It numbered the hours in which his best poems were written. It was the old clock on the stairs. The "Wreck of the Hesperus" was written in 1839 at midnight. A violent storm had occurred the night before; the distress and disasters at sea had been great, especially along the coasts of the New England coast. The papers of the day were full of the disaster. The poet was sitting alone in his study late at night when the vision of the wrecked Hesperus came drifting on the disturbed tides of thought into his mind. He went to bed, but could not sleep. He arose and wrote the poem, which came into his mind by whole stanzas, finishing them just as the clock—the old clock on the stairs—was striking three.

Sir Walter Scott says that he was led to write "Kenilworth" because the first stanza of Mickie's famous ballad of "Cumnor Hall" haunted him:—

"The dew of summer-night did fall,
The moon, sweet regent of the sky,
Silvered the towers of Cumnor hall,
And many an oak that grew thereby."

Longfellow says that he was, as he thinks, led to write the "Wreck of the Hesperus" because the words "Norman Woe," which were associated with the disasters at sea, seemed to him so indescribably sad. "Excelsior" was written after receiving a letter from Charles Sumner full of lofty sentiments. "Hiawatha" owes much of its story and the embellishment of musical Indian names to the researches of Schoolcraft. Abraham LeFort, an Onondaga chief who was a supposed graduate of Geneva College, furnished Schoolcraft with the Indian tradition of Hiawatha. You may find it in Schoolcraft, part III., page 814, and in the same volume you may find the Indian vocabularies from which the poet enriched his verse. The poet has added much to the original tradition.—National Journal of Education.

RUSSIA.

After a few weeks of ominous silence, the world is startled by the announcement that the Nihilists of Russia have fired the Kremlin at Moscow. We have frequently stated in these columns that the revolutionary movement in Russia was one of serious import, and not the simple demonstration of a scattered band of malcontents, as some would have us believe. This uprising means nothing more or less than the crushing out of the Romanoff dynasty. These tyrannous despots from Tartary found Russia far advanced in civilization, and much superior to the surrounding nations of Europe at that period. How will they leave her? After a lapse of several centuries, while other nations have been developing and growing great in all that constitutes a true and progressive civilization, she has not only stood still, but retrograded into a semi-barbarism perfectly appalling in this era of enlightenment. The Russian has been kept in the position he finds himself by reason of his ignorance, it being the policy of the government to refuse education to the masses. Another potent aid to the tyranny of the Czar lies in the all-absorbing belief in his religion, which the wily Tartars have been cunning enough to make the engine of government. Still another aid to the Russian's own degradation is the belief that has until recently been part of the Russian creed, that the Czar is divine in his nature and the direct vice-regent of God upon earth. But these old worn-out creeds have had their day. Striking off the shackles of his ignorance, and seeing, as in a glass darkly, that he is a man, and not the born foot-ball of princes, the victim of a despotism of centuries has lit the torch of insurrection, and announced to the world his determination to be free.

It is not long since the Russian government might have checked this revolutionary movement; but, with a fatality that always attends despots, the Czar deliberately threw away the only hope left him to maintain his dynasty on the throne. This was the adoption of three reformatory measures, the first being a representative constitution; the second, a revaluation of the land awarded the peasantry under the Emancipation Act of 1821; and, third, liberty of conscience to dissenters from the Established Church. It is only a few weeks ago that a constitution based on these reforms was drawn up by the ministry and submitted to the Czar. It was sternly rejected by him, and the governments of Europe were informed that it never had been his intention to grant any constitution whatever. The carrying out of the order concerning the revaluation of land alone might have stopped the course of revolution. It would have aroused something like an old-time enthusiasm for the Czar in the breasts of the people. Its moral influence would have been very great, and more potent in checking the Nihilist movement than all the hangmen, jailors, dungeons, knots, and armed battalions of the empire combined. It was only two weeks ago that the central government officially promulgated throughout Russia that no revaluation of land should be made, denouncing those who desired it to be done, and threatening punishment to all who again should demand it. Again, there are in Russia about twelve millions of dissenters, numbering the very flower and backbone of the peasantry. Had the government not refused to grant them equality of rights with members of the Established Church, they would have rallied around the Czar, because they still have some veneration for him. But not utterly regardless of all promises, and doubtless exasperated against his rebellious subjects because they have dared to begin to think for themselves, he evidently believes that the only way to secure his throne is by utterly crushing down the people with an iron heel, instead of removing the cause of their restlessness. For weary years they have waited in the hope that their "father" would remove their grievances and make lighter the burdens under which they have groaned; but since the Czar has officially announced his intention of not interfering in any manner with existing laws, the last vestige of hope has departed and nothing remains for them but red handed rebellion and the sword. That they have accepted the gauntlet now thrown down to them, is shown by the daring attempt to destroy the very citadel of Moscow. Every preparation had been made to destroy it, the furniture, walls, and upholstery being saturated with inflammatory material. That this could have been done without detection, shows the deep nature of the conspiracy, and the courage and resolution of the conspirators. It was probably the work of officers in the army, and, perhaps, members of the Czar's household were engaged in it. The true nature and extent of this Nihilist conspiracy will not be known until Russia is in flames from one extremity of her territory to the other, and the members of the present reigning house are driven from the land in exile.

In the meantime, everything is being done to goad the people to acts of desperation. That the hidden work of the Nihilists is going on with unabated zeal and energy, we are continually having evidence. The government knows not whom to trust. The revolutionists are like the locusts of Egypt for multitude, and a common purpose seems to actuate the dwellers in hovels and palaces. The house of Romanoff is doomed. The student of history can read the handwriting on the wall. The day of judgment has arrived, when the members of that despotic line will be called to stern account for the millions of lives that have been sacrificed upon the altars of their ambition. The Romanoffs are foreign usurpers who centuries ago burst upon Russia from the plains of Tartary, making her a subjugated land. If she had been governed by her native princes, instead of by foreigners through whose veins runs Tartar blood, in this latter half of the nineteenth century she would have been a happy, powerful, and enlightened nation, instead of a race of groaning, ignorant slaves, whose civilization is not much in advance of that of the thirteenth century.—Albany Times.

PROFESSOR F. W. NEWMAN ON THE RELIGIOUS MISCHIEFS OF CREDULITY.

Sunday, July 13, before a crowded congregation at Langham Hall, Prof. F. W. Newman, preaching for the Rev. C. Voysey, delivered one of the most remarkable and important discourses of modern times. He began by pointing out the tendency of even the purest religious beliefs to revert into superstition, if not scrupulously guarded or strengthened by persecution and exclusion. Drawing attention to the consciousness of an invisible world, as the distinguishing feature of humanity when contrasted with the lower animals, he argued that from our intellect and affection only could we learn anything about God; and although these, when cultured, furnish very exalted conceptions, the greatest care and scrutiny were needed, lest we should impute weakness and imperfection to the Deity. Our bias towards poetical imagination, love of fancy and gossip, easy belief of reports, dislike of patient thought, and preference for trusting in other people's opinion over the trouble of thinking for oneself. These were the sources of superstitious and religious errors which at one time would lead a Unitarian back to Anglican Orthodoxy; at another, an Anglican into Roman Catholic Sacerdotalism. Even theists will be in danger of such reversion, if they undervalue the pernicious force of delusion. The professor illustrated this delusion by describing the rise of Mariolatry, and passed on to show the amazing credulity by which Christianity was first established and received. He alluded to the fact that the Israelites had been as uncritical as the Christians; but no vital harm to religion was done, because they left untouched the absolute unity of God,—man was not intruded into ambiguous Deity. Christianity had, by its new interpretation of the Messianic ideas, plunged its followers into shameful idolatry. Here the professor commented with well-deserved censure on the conduct of Jesus, as reported by the Evangelists, in reference to the claim of Messiahship, and yet in dying without expounding the full facts, and leaving the question to be the source of evil controversy to the Church and of bloodshed to the world. The preacher then traced the doctrine of the Logos, which was the product as much of Greek as of Jewish thought. Beginning in the book of Proverbs, and reappearing in the Apocryphal book, the Wisdom of Solomon, and in the wild and silly prophecy called the book of Enoch, the impersonation of wisdom by oriental poetry grew into a form of dualism, which involved a recognition of at least two gods, Platonism combined with the oriental conception, and was accepted by Jews at Alexandria; Philo, and subsequently Paul, being prominent teachers of Neoplatonism. Within thirty years of the death of Jesus, and before the destruction of Jerusalem, the Christian creed was fast becoming idolatrous. The Logos was identified with the Messiah, and the Messiah with Jesus of Nazareth. He was raised and raised above men until he became equal with God, and last was made God. Denial or criticism was accounted blasphemy. Readiness to accept it was deemed meritorious faith, to be rewarded with salvation.

Prof. Newman then dwelt at some length on the case of Keshub Chunder Sen, who has lately been using expressions of mystical reverence and love for Jesus, and especially for those precepts which Paul could not endorse nor Protestants ever approve. He traced this lapse into idolatry to the indiscriminate use of the Gospels and reading them without due criticism, and he urged on parents and teachers the importance of not allowing them to be read by children as a religious book. He denounced the Gospels in the boldest terms, saying "he did not know a single moral lesson of the slightest importance for which we were obliged to have recourse to them. The narrative is everywhere untrustworthy, often slanderous and unjust; and anything good in the precepts is too dearly bought. A perpetually hostile commentary is all but necessary." The professor then spoke of the reluctance which is felt on hearing a word against the conduct of Jesus, and he justified his attack by saying that an argument for Christianity had been based on the alleged perfection of Jesus, at the same time alluding to and lamenting the unkind treatment which he had himself received for his candor. Just as Unitarians are forced to repudiate the Orthodox dogmas so ripe and rampant around them, so are theistic teachers compelled to warn their flocks against a relapse into credulity; and here the preacher passed an encomium upon the Rev. C. Voysey for his frank and instant disavowal of Keshub Chunder Sen's fond panegyric of Jesus.

As the professor's sermon will be published in the regular series of the "Langham Hall Pulpit," it is unnecessary to go further into detail. Suffice it that the sermon was brought to a close by one of the most powerful and formidable bills of indictment against Jesus as depicted in the Gospels, especially concerning the claims he made to superhuman power and authority which would not be admitted in our day for a single moment. Every word of this accusation was sustained by the New Testament. If it be true, as Dr. Arnold of Rugby said, that we "need something nearer to us than God," that is a confession that the tendency to idolatry is a sin against which we should struggle, and not yield to thorough moral infirmity.

Christianity divides mankind and sows strife, discord, and bloodshed in the world. A religion which is to promote union and charity must above all exclude from itself historical and legendary elements, for these will inevitably generate diverse mythologies and eat into true religion as a canker. The discourse occupied nearly an hour, and was listened to with breathless attention, many a one among the congregation, like ourselves, observing there was only one other religious teacher in England besides Prof. Newman who had the courage to attack the prevailing idolatry in a similar manner, and that was the clergyman whose pulpit Prof. Newman had so ably filled.—Jewish World.

RELIGION AND MORALITY.—From time immemorial it has been common for persons under sentence of death to become very religious before the arrival of the day of execution. The exceptions to this rule—the number of persons who have died scoffers—have been comparatively few. Indeed, this has been an argument frequently made use of in favor of capital punishment. It has been defended as a most efficient means of effecting the conversion and final salvation of the most abandoned and the most hardened. It has happened, singularly enough, that of late the religious character of murderers has appeared at an earlier period in their history. Thus in the fatal letter of Covert Bennett to Mrs. Smith, written in jail,—the letter which convicted them both,—there are devout and reverent references to the divine protection on which she is assured they may depend. The mulatto Cox was noted as a religious person, and was actually attending church when arrested in Boston. He professes a great dislike of rough and profane company. The case of Hilaire Latrimouille, the French Canadian just convicted at Albany of the cruel murder of a maiden lady for the purpose of robbery, furnishes another illustration in point. At a house where Latrimouille spent a night, after the murder, he was observed at his evening and morning devotions. What do all these things prove? They go to show that there may be a good deal of emotional piety without any fixed and re-training principle.—New York Sun.

COX VOUCHES FOR AS A CHRISTIAN.—"I have visited Chastine Cox, the murderer of Mrs. Hall, two or three times a week ever since his incarceration," said the Rev. Dr. Dickerson, in the New York Bethel African Methodist Church. "He is not understood by the public, who have read nothing about him thus far except that he is lively, that he courts attention, and that, in face of the dread fact that he is doomed to an early death on the gallows, he loves to joke with his visitors. My friends, that man stands alone. The people who come to see him are those who come out of curiosity, and who care nothing for the soul that is so soon to be ushered into the presence of the Almighty. Cox has gone to the Father of all and pleaded for pardon through the Savior. He has received that pardon and is saved. He tells me that immediately after the burglary he began to pray, and from that time to this he has continued to pray. When he went to Boston he joined in the worship of God at Ebenzer Church, and it was while listening to a sermon that he was arrested. His seeming indifference to his impending fate is the God-given consciousness that when his earthly career is done he will be taken into the kingdom of the merciful Father, who never forgets the promises he has made to erring souls."

HELL.

The legend o'er my portal groweth dim,
My fire-red minarets no longer gleam
Through ebon dark, and o'er my ninefold stream
Old Charon's crazy wherry doth not swim.
I was of poets three the lurid dream;
The moody Florentine most lifelike wrought
My penal halls, filling their lampless gloom
With writhing agony and shrieks of woe;
He to the wicked dead a righteous doom,
With Rhadamanthine justice, gave below;
His muse to mightiest sinners terror brought.
They saw in dreams my furnaces aglow.
The dread of me was salutary long:
For this mild age I only flame in Dante's song.

The Index.

BOSTON, AUGUST 28, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLDO Office, No. 35 MONROE STREET: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases: i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

RELIGION AND CRIME.

A few weeks since, there was an editorial in the New York Evening Post which bore the title "Materialism and Crime." It was the far-fetched and sophistical argument of a practised journalist to prove that the marked increase of crime which has been witnessed of late is to be attributed to the rapid development during this period of rationalistic or what were termed materialistic tendencies. A cooler exhibition of effrontery, in view of the obvious facts and evidences that go to controvert such a position, or a more strenuous attempt to twist them to the support of unwarranted conclusions, seldom appears even in a newspaper. It seemed to corroborate the assertion of Henry Ward Beecher, that there are on the editorial staff of the leading journals of New York, persons who are ready to furnish when wanted, in readable style and terse and vigorous diction, what pass for able and exhaustive articles, in direct contradiction to the writers' convictions. But we suspect it might not be well to assume too much in this respect in the instance referred to. The general public at least might not be prepared for such a view of the case. A devoted and intelligent friend of THE INDEX who does not entertain the opinion of the Evening Post writer, but quite the opposite, sent us a note with the article above mentioned enclosed, and expressed the desire to have it reviewed in these columns. As we had at the time all we could well compass in the way of what exacted immediate attention, we transferred the request to our more competent friend Mr. B. F. Underwood, whose long experience and well-known acquirements in relation to the points of controversy involved eminently qualify him for their discussion. As was to be expected, with his characteristic amiability and willingness ever to serve the cause of freethought, and never more than when assailed, he readily acquiesced in the proposal, and submits in the present number of THE INDEX his response. And now the subject is up for discussion in THE INDEX, as it has been in the newspapers in general of late, it occurs to us that we may without trenching on Mr. Underwood's ground put together some reflections upon the theme which shall serve as a not wholly unworthy appendage to the ampler consideration of it which he presents.

It is of course understood that in attempting to make materialism accountable for recent crime, it is implied that religion is to be regarded as the guarantee of virtue. Even granting that the first part of this corollary were valid, it does not follow that the other is true. If it were so, how does it happen that so many of the most startling crimes of the last few years have been associated with religion? It is clear that the connection is more than coincidence. We believe, on the other hand, that a close examination and logical insight into religion, not the religion of Pagans but of Christians, will show that it involves conceptions which may, under certain circumstances, offer incentives to crime. We are aware that this may seem a hard saying to many. But is it really such? It can readily be seen, we think, upon reflection, susceptible of demonstration.

Take the Pocasset case, for example. What can be plainer than that Freeman, in taking the life of his child, had no thought of perpetrating a crime? It was to his mind a most religious act. He was simply taking the traditions of his religion and teachers at their word; but conforming to the dictates of what he had been taught was the supreme authority as to conduct. It was but a surpassing exercise as he supposed, and rightly, of that faith which is continually inculcated and commended all through the Christian Scriptures as the very essence of religion, the culmination of Christian virtue, without which it is impossible to please God.

The wife of Freeman, a devout Christian no less than himself, and if not the partner at least the approver of the crime, declares that her husband had no idea he should kill his little girl. He supposed that if he had perfect faith his hand would be stayed in the act, as Abraham's was of old, or that in some way she would be preserved. And with such religious influences as there were in operation upon his mind, he had all-sufficient reason for the assurance. It is impossible to read the Bible with the conceptions of it that Freeman evidently entertained and had been taught, without believing that there is associated with the highest exercise of faith a wonder-working power. Without referring to the Old Testament for proof of this, consider the impression which the teachings of Jesus are calculated to give. Is he not represented as saying to the blind and maimed and diseased, upon whom his miracles are wrought, "Thy faith hath saved thee"? Does he not give assurance to his disciples that through it they shall be able to remove mountains and to perform even greater things than he has done? Christian ministers are never weary of reading to their congregations that chapter of Paul's epistle, and of implying to their uncritical and unscientific intelligence that its statements are literally to be received, in which numerous examples from the sacred records are related of the miraculous achievements of faith, and as attestations of its indispensableness to the divine favor. Are we not, even in our day of advanced knowledge and intelligence, continually hearing of institutions that are built and supported, cures and manifold wonders wrought, by this supernatural agency? Nay, even among comparatively enlightened so-called liberal Christians, there are witnessed indications of the idea that there must necessarily be an incomprehensible charm or potency in religious faith, and that to surrender it must expose one to some dreadful unseen calamity. Is it strange, then, that one who literally accepted the Bible as the "Word of God" and the guide of his life, and who was little disposed to seek instruction from any other source, should have been betrayed into committing the terrible deed of which he was the author? Can we blame him as we would an ordinary criminal, or hold him to the same account? Is there not, in fact, in this very conception of supernaturalism—the detachment of acts and occurrences from their regular correlations of antecedents and consequents, this dissolution of the chain of the uniform operations of cause and effect, and the view that we may rightfully act and confidently expect results independent of such relations, when combined with the religion of a crude and narrow intelligence—a warrant for the perpetration of any atrocity to which the mind may be impelled? Is not the person, just to the extent that such ideas dominate his intelligence, rendered incompetent and irresponsible for rational action? Of course this state of mind will be modified always, in a certain degree, by the amount of moral and intellectual enlightenment in his environment. But when the situation is such that there is but little of this, it is not strange if religion becomes associated with various forms of extravagance and criminality. Such has invariably been the case, as the annals of the numerous persecutions and inhumanities of religion in the past abundantly testify. Without enlightenment and the knowledge of the nature and consequence of conduct which modern science tends to give, which in fact is essential rationalism, religion may mislead no less than guide, and be as prolific of evil as good,—as much of a bane as a blessing to mankind.

The case of the German Kammier who shot his three little girls affords a striking parallel to the Pocasset tragedy. Surely, if there is any clue to the motive of this crime, it is to be traced to the influence of religious conceptions. Kammier when interrogated by the reporter said, "Of course I believe in a God. I am a Christian; I am not a Catholic, but a Protestant Christian, and just as good a Christian as anybody. I know my children are in heaven and I shall see them again, for I expect to go there too." Certainly there is little evidence here of materialism. It is clear, on the contrary, that he was still another of the melancholy, deluded victims of religion. Eliminate from his mind the idea of heaven, nay obliterate his Christian conceptions and modes of thinking,—transform him, in a word, into a free-thinker or materialist if you will, if such a thought be possible,—and, whatever he might have been, one thing is sure: he would not have had the incentive which impelled him to his deed of cruel and unnatural horror.

Is there not reason to believe that in such an event he would have seen that whatever the disadvantages or adverse prospect of fortune for his children might be, if he truly loved them there was but one alternative to which there was recourse,—to endeavor through all possible means to prepare them to meet those experiences with brave hearts, unswerving rectitude and endurance?

Nay, would he not, if his mind were able to rise to so exalted a contemplation, see that to take the chances of such a struggle, and fall even, were far better than for him to deprive them of the opportunity thus afforded of heroism and self-development, or for them to shirk, if they desired, their share of the work and burden of human life?

Chastine Cox is another of the recent exemplifications of the compatibility of crime and religion. He was, in common with those already mentioned, in no sense a sceptic and a scoffer. He had been in the habit of going to church, and claimed to be a Christian; indeed, was coming out of church when arrested for murder. When interviewed in jail, he said, "I feel pretty good. But the Lord will take care of me; and his will be done. I ain't had much trust in anybody else." There are those among Christians who are accustomed to believe the Lord will get them through any scrape if they but put their trust in him. Alluding to the two colored men who showed him the way to the Baptist church in Boston where he spent the evening on which he was arrested, Cox remarked, "I told them I had been a member of the Baptist Church in New York a long time; and we talked on religion." It was no doubt a good deal of comfort to him just then. It may be that was the special inducement for him to go to church that evening, thinking the prospect of escape from the penalty of his crime would be commensurately augmented if he thus secured God's favor. Speaking to the reporter of his mother, he said, "She is, like me, a Christian;" and further added, in referring to his early days: "I hear that my old pastor, 'Pap' Spellman, preached a sermon about me. He hasn't been to see me since I came here. Poor old 'Pap'! I prayed for him last night, and I pray for him every night."

Of Joseph Buzzell, who was executed at Concord, N.H., last month, it was reported that "he died with faith in salvation." "The balance of the time up to twenty minutes of eleven was spent by him mainly in reading the Testament, commenting upon it, occasionally alluding to the efforts made to procure a confession, and frequently saying, 'This is not in accordance with Christ's teachings.' At twenty minutes before eleven," says the chaplain, "we knelt together in prayer, I leading and he following." As the officers were binding his hands he repeated, "This is not in accordance with the teachings of Christ." Of Robert Jones, hanged at Raleigh, N.C., on the 25th of July, it is stated that he dwelt long on his religious experience in his last hours, and partook of the communion. He expressed assurance that he was but to pass from earth to heaven. Latramonille, who was to pay the penalty of his life upon the gallows in Albany last week, is represented to have been in the habit of reciting his prayers every night, and abstaining from meat according to the prescription of the Church, after having committed a murder of the most shocking character. The list might be extended indefinitely. The marvellous feature in connection with all these cases is the utter absence betokened of the suspicion of any incongruity between a life of the utmost moral degradation, or the recent crimes with which their hands were stained, and sudden translation into the full approbation of God, the most blissful and perfect realizations of religion both in this world and beyond. Now, if the end of religion is not character, but assurance of escape from penalty hereafter, as the Church has long implied, and as is likely to be the feeling with respect to it in such cases as those we have noticed; if it is still further attended with certain hampering restrictions to which an untrained and lawless tendency of nature would prefer not to conform, and all its benefits may be obtained in the last moments of life in this world and even after a course of grossest infamy,—is there not, under the circumstances, very strong inducement to defer such an adjustment in relation to the future until the prison-cell or the gallows forces it upon the immediate attention?

But not only in these lower walks of life, but in higher ones as well, has there been accumulating evidence of late of the possible union of religion and crime. The various defalcations and embezzlements at Fall River and elsewhere show that a person may be very sound in faith and devout in character, and yet deficient in a practical regard for rectitude and honesty.

Perhaps this is but what we should expect in view of the times in which we are living. The testimony of history is, that the decay of religious systems is always attended with a comparative decline of morals. On one hand, there is the tendency to double dealing,—to maintain an outward allegiance to doctrines and creeds for the advantages accruing, even when belief in them has departed. This is everywhere manifest at present, alike in the pulpit and pews. Even allowing that materialism is somewhat accountable for this, would not a larger measure of sincerity, a braver dealing with doubt and what is becoming so generally regarded as unreasonable, be favorable to an increase of uprightness and honesty? We do not question it. On the other hand, there are those who have outgrown the old faiths, but have not embraced any equivalent standard of moral action. We recognize both of these elements in the moral and intellectual life of to-day. But as freedom rather than slavery is the ultimate and most desirable condition for every human being, notwithstanding all the evils that may intervene in the passage to it, so we believe that rationalism rather than superstition or credulity is as inevitable and desirable. We have passed the stage of belief that a freethinker must necessarily have more honor and worth than a Christian. At the same time, we maintain the assumption can no longer be trusted that religion is the safeguard of virtue. We anticipate a higher development of morality for mankind in the future than the world as yet has seen. But we look for it, not through a return to the ecclesiasticism and creeds of the past, but the growth of rationalism, with all its hopes and promises of virtue and intelligence for the race, society, and the individual; and for this, in our humble way we propose to labor and wait.

WHO WILL RESPOND.

The following letter from a member of the Indian Brahmo Somaj will explain itself. In response to his request, the Free Religious Association can send its own publications, and perhaps some friend who sees this will place at its disposal also, to add to the package, a set of Theodore Parker's works and Conway's Sacred Anthology, which is probably the other book desired.

W. J. P.

TO THE SECRETARY OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF AMERICA, BOSTON, U.S.:

Sir,—At the outset I must beg to apologize for venturing to intrude myself before you. Before proceeding further, allow me to intimate to you that I belong to that great body of theists known as the Brahmo Somaj, whose name you may be fairly acquainted with. It has been my earnest desire for some years past to study the theological works by eminent authors of England and America; but as it was found impracticable to secure their books I was obliged to repress it. Later on, I accidentally met with a book entitled Hopes of the Human Race, by F. P. Cobbe. Its perusal added tenfold to the already existing eagerness in the mind. Soon after, I addressed a letter to the Rev. Charles Voysey, the minister of the theistic congregation of London, for any assistance he might render to me. In reply, the reverend gentleman promised me his publications. He has since that time been kind enough to favor me with his beautiful works styled The King and the Stone, the intervening volumes of which I am sorry to say are now out of print. He has been even kind enough to forward me his weekly sermons, every month regularly. I am much grateful to the reverend gentleman for the valuable presents he has made to me, inasmuch as the sermons have been found to respond to a great extent to the cravings of the heart, and been the source of soothing to the soul. A missionary of the Brahmo Somaj, while on a visit to our church, related a few incidents from the life of Theodore Parker, whose complete and comprehensive biography he said has been published in America, and recommended the book to us as worth while making it a subject of study. He also directed our attention to a compilation from the great religions of the world used as a text-book for pulpits by the Free Religious Society of America. I should be extremely indebted and thankful to you if you would kindly condescend to favor with a copy of the biography, the sermons and other books by Theodore Parker, the compilation text-book, as also any other philosophical and theological works and periodicals which in your opinion would be useful to an Indian. These presents shall be considered incalculable gifts by myself and future generations.

I beg here to say that if you consider me a fit subject for the books I apply for, I shall feel obliged by your kindly subscribing on the books, under your own signature, that they have been presented to me.

With best regards I beg to remain, dear sir,

Yours,
PANOHANAN MADAK.

MATERIALISM AND CRIME.

It is now conceded by all intelligent critics and opponents of his philosophy, that Epikuros was personally one of the purest men of antiquity, that he was a model of temperance and simplicity, that he dwelt with his disciples in his famous garden in the purest fellowship, and died at an advanced age in the midst of his circle of followers and friends, honored and beloved for his wisdom and his serene and beautiful life. He taught that "virtue is the only permanent element of pleasure," that "man cannot be happy unless he is wise, noble, and just, and, conversely, that man cannot be wise, noble, and just without being really happy." It was the moral beauty and simplicity of his philosophy that attracted to it the Roman Lucretius, who, amidst the confusion and turbulence of civil war, "sought some stay for his inner life, and found it in the philosophy of Epikuros," in defence and exposition of which he gave to the world one of the grandest didactic poems of classical antiquity.

Yet Epikuros, even while living, was misunderstood, misrepresented, and maligned, and after his death fresh calumnies were added to old ones, and industriously circulated to blacken his memory and destroy his influence. The multitude were made to believe that he was a slave of his lusts, who, to make his theory consistent with his practice, actually advocated gluttony, intemperance, and sensuality as the highest virtues. Thus envy, ignorance, and religious bigotry combined to represent him as a monster of depravity, and his name became proverbialized for every species of indulgence and excess.

Epikureanism having become confounded with license and libertinism, there were not a few who professed to accept the philosophy, modifying it to make it conform to their superficial theories and loose morals, but still retaining the name to give to their notions the dignity and importance of a philosophic system which should justify the lives they lived.

"The Romans," says Lange, in his thorough and impartial History of Materialism, "had become practical materialists, often in the very worst sense of the term, before they had yet learned the theory. The theory of Epikuros was, however, in every way purer and nobler than the practice of these Romans; and so now two courses were open to them: they either allowed themselves to be purified and became modest and temperate, or they corrupted the theory, and so combined the conception of its friends and foes that they ended by having a theory of Epikureanism which corresponded to their habits." Vol. I., p. 128.

These facts pertaining to Epikuros, indicating the character of the opposition his teachings have had to encounter, have been brought to mind on reading in a recent number of the New York Post an editorial article, headed "Materialism and Crime," in which the writer, with an utter disregard of truth, makes an assault on a philosophic system of which apparently he knows nothing, indulging in the same kind of misrepresentation, and employing the same means to arouse prejudice and resentment against an unpopular system, that were used against Epikuros and his teachings more than two thousand years ago. The writer says, "We believe it to be susceptible of demonstration, that the late extraordinary and deplorable increase of crime" "is largely due to the growth of materialism, or what is termed infidelity." "The fruit of unbelief among the upper or wealthy classes is sensuality. Those classes get to worship, instead of their Maker, the pleasures of the moment. They bow down to rich food and fine clothes and enervating amusements. They make goddesses of women who possess mere physical beauty. Their hearts are set on yachts and race-courses and theatres and operas." "One after another the commandments are broken as they stand in the way of desire, and a shameful ruin is left at last in place of what might have been a perfect temple; a shattered and sated voluptuary in place of a nobly-perfected human being. Among the poorer and less educated ranks of society, the cant and poison of living only for the day is even more directly disastrous. The rich can gratify their passions without, as a rule and in the legal sense, coming in contact with the rights of others. But the needy, unrestrained by any fear of future account and thinking only to eat and drink since to-morrow they die, drive straight on to crime. That this is no idle assertion, can be abundantly proved. A careful survey of the murders, suicides, and other great felonies committed in the chief cities of the United States during the last ten years shows that a heavy fraction of the perpetrators were atheists or free-thinkers. These unhappy persons, persuaded that life is the be-all and end-all here, imagine that in their calculations they can jump the life to be exacted in a future one. "Has experience shown, and especially in those annals of crime we have taken occasion to discuss, that there is any better conservator of society than the simple piety of our grandfathers?"

Observe here that materialism as a system of thought which is confined to a comparatively small number of minds, which has no attraction for the masses and is the philosophy of but a small proportion of "infidels" even, which is a subject of no interest whatever to the worshippers of fashion, to mere pleasure-seekers, to political demagogues or those whose energies are wholly employed in the scramble for wealth, is confounded with that so-called "practical materialism" which is more commonly found in every country among the adherents of the popular faith than among those who reject that faith and attach themselves to a hated reform or adopt an unpopular theory. "Persons who worship nothing but worldly success, who care for nothing but wealth or fashionable display or personal celebrity or sensual gratification," says Fluke, "are loosely called materialists. The term can therefore easily be made to serve as a poisoned weapon, and there are theologians who do not scruple to employ it as such against the upholders of philosophic opinions which they do not like, but are unable to refute. A most flagrant instance was recently afforded by a lecturer on Positivism, who, after insinuating that pretty much the whole body of contemporary scientific philosophers are positivists, and that positivists are but very little better than materialists, proceeded to inform his audience that materialists are men who lead licentious lives." Cosmic Philosophy, Vol. II., p. 433.

Let the editor of the Post, by an appeal to history or by a reference to facts of the present day, show, if he can, that philosophical materialism leads to vice and crime, instead of joining the theologian in confounding it with sensualism, and ascribing to it evils which are found in the greatest magnitude and to the most alarming extent where materialism is the least known, and where it has exerted the least influence. He will find, as Lange says, "that the sober earnest which marks the great materialistic systems of antiquity is perhaps more suited than an enthusiastic idealism, which only too easily results in its own bewilderment, to keep the soul clear of all that is low and vulgar, and to lend it a lasting effort after worthy objects" (History of Materialism, p. 47), and that "in the centuries when the abominations of a Nero, a Caligula, or even of a Heliogabalus, polluted the globe, no philosophy was more neglected, none was more foreign to the spirit of the time, than that of all which demanded the coldest blood, the calmest contemplation, the most sober and purely prosaic inquiry, the philosophy of Demokritos and Epikuros." p. 167. If this editor will extend his observation and acquaintance to the lives and character of materialists of to-day, he will find them thoughtful, earnest men and women, possessing generally marked individuality, indifferent to the fashionable pleasures of society, and devoted to reformatory movements of the times. So long as editors of influential journals will unite with the clergy in giving the name materialism to anything and everything that are objectionable and odious, so long will be included in its ranks, nominally, thousands, including unworthy and immoral persons, who really know nothing about materialism, and whose characters are more the result of the religious faith in which they were brought up than of a philosophy of which they are totally ignorant.

If the increase of crime and vice is largely due to "materialism or what is termed infidelity," the pious editor of the Post should not be backward in making known to the world the evidence on which this statement is founded. The mere fact that among the wealthy classes sensuality prevails, and that there is a desire for rich food and fine clothes and enervating amusements, for yachts and race-courses and theatres and operas and beautiful women, will hardly be accepted as proof that these classes are under the influence of materialism or of infidelity. If the desire for these things were confined to materialists and infidels, and it were certain that they are all indications of depravity and wickedness, they might be referred to to sustain the position taken; but when it is undeniable that "the good things of this world," including those of questionable propriety, are enjoyed by Christians with quite as much zest as they are by unbelievers, it is hardly fair to mention them as proof that infidelity is corrupting society.

That those "among the poorer and less educated ranks of society," who "drive straight on to crime," are materialists or infidels, that a "heavy fraction" of the murders, suicides, and other great felonies committed in the chief cities of the United States during the last ten years have been perpetrated by "atheists or free-thinkers," that "a collection of the letters or other papers left by criminals when anticipating death shows a fearful number of instances, some of which many readers will recall, of absolute disbelief in the existence of a God or in any reckoning for wrong done in this life to be exacted in a future one," are statements so absolutely false, that they suggest that the maxim nulla fides cum hereticis is a part of the moral code of the pious editor of the Post.

Whoever has read the daily papers the past ten years knows that nearly all the murderers that have been executed in this country during that time have avowed belief in the Christian religion, and died expecting pardon through the great bankrupt salvation-scheme called the atonement. The letters and papers left by them, as well as their dying words, show that they lived, not with the materialistic belief that cause and effect are invariably linked together, and that it is impossible to escape the consequences of our acts, but under the influence of the demoralizing doctrine that the effects of a life of immorality and crime can be washed away by the blood of a crucified Saviour, and that, while a Humboldt, an Emerson, a Parker, a George Eliot, a Harriet Martineau, are likely to be damned for their unbelief, the red-handed murderer, if he "make his peace with God" before dying, is sure to have a crown of glory and to be forever with the Lord. All the reports and statistics to which I have had access how that the great majority of criminals in our prisons and penitentiaries are from the Orthodox denominations. The number marked atheist, unbeliever, or free-thinker is exceedingly small. A large percentage of the seductions and adulteries recorded by the daily press are by Christian clergymen, with the accounts of whose amours the daily papers have teemed the past few years. When we hear of a defaulting bank-officer, we regard it as probable, taught by experience, that he is a Christian, a church-member, and probably a Sunday-school teacher. The drunkards, prostitutes, and thieves who constitute the majority of offenders that figure in the police courts of our large cities are not materialists or infidels, but almost invariably believers in the Bible and Christianity, and persons whose indignation would be excited by a denial of the authority of the Bible or the efficacy of Christ's blood to redeem men from sin.

If observation, experience, and history teach anything clearly and unmistakably, it is that the strongest and most intense faith in religious dogmas may coexist with the grossest immorality. We see it exemplified in the lives of men to-day. It has been so in the past. "A wager might be laid," says Mommsen in his History of Rome, "that the more lax any woman was, the more piously she worshipped Isis." Korinth of antiquity was as full of religion as of vice. The Byzantine Empire under Christianity existed nearly eleven centuries. Faith abounded and materialism was unknown. Yet of that empire, Lecky says, "The universal verdict of history is that it constitutes, without a single exception, the most thoroughly base and despicable form that civilization has yet assumed." "There has been no other enduring civilization so absolutely destitute of all the forms and elements of greatness, and none to which the epithet mean may be so emphatically applied. The Byzantine Empire was preeminently the age of treachery. Its vices were the vices of men who ceased to be brave without learning to be virtuous. Without patriotism, without the fruition or desire of liberty after the first paroxysm of religious agitation, without genius or intellectual activity, slaves and willing slaves in both their actions and their thoughts, immersed in sensuality and the most frivolous pleasures, the people only emerged from their listlessness when some theological subtlety, or some rivalry in the chariot races, stimulated them into frantic riots. . . . Constantinople sank beneath the Crescent, its inhabitants wrangling about theological differences to the very moment of their fall." (History of Morals, Vol. II., p. 15.)

The advancement of the world morally, as well as intellectually, has corresponded, not with the belief in theological dogmas, but with the increase of scepticism,—which is the precursor of reform and the handmaid of progress,—with the decay of theology and the diffusion of scientific knowledge. The most advanced nations of Christendom are the most "infidel" nations, such as England, Germany, France, and the United States. Where there is the least scepticism and the most unquestioning faith, there is the least enlightenment, culture, and true morality. "The simple piety of our grandfathers" is still much applauded by writers like the editor of the Post; but it was chiefly a mixture of ignorance, intolerance, selfishness, and religious zeal. It encouraged slavery and the slave trade, advertised the sale of negroes together with New England rum, cheated and defrauded the Indians, imprisoned and banished Quakers, whipped women, repressed independent thought, and made and enforced laws among the most despotic and damnable that ever cursed any country or people. It is not denied that the men who did these things had sterling qualities, but they were not the result of their "simple piety," nor were their distorted ideas of right and duty, or the wrongs and cruelties they perpetrated, "due to the growth of materialism, or what is termed infidelity."

In periods of rapid transition from one political system or religious belief to another, there is liable to be, temporarily, more or less disturbance of the general order of society, due not necessarily to the influence of the newly adopted principles, but more likely to the inability of the mind to adjust itself, at once, to changes involving the abolition of forms or the surrender of doctrines which had been long associated in the popular mind with conceptions of right and propriety. The cession of a portion of France to the Protestants was followed by irregularities and excesses, to which Catholics of that day referred as evidence of the mischievous tendency of the teachings of the Reformers, with quite as much justice as some Protestant writers of to-day attempt to explain the increase of crime by ascribing it to the influence of freedom of thought in religious matters.

Some of the real causes which have led to an increase of crime the past few years are not difficult to see; but the pious editor of the Post, in his eagerness to make a point against "materialism, or what is termed infidelity," passes them all by, and finds the chief reasons to be religious disbelief in general and atheism in particular! To his attention the following extract from Max Müller is respectfully commended: "As to atheistic religions, they might seem to be perfectly impossible; and yet the fact cannot be disputed away, that the religion of Buddha was from the beginning purely atheistic. The idea of the Godhead, after it had been degraded by endless mythological absurdities which struck and repelled the heart of Buddha, was, for a time at least, entirely expelled from the sanctuary of the human mind, and the highest morality that was ever taught before the rise of Christianity was taught by men with whom the gods had become mere phantoms, and who had no altars, not even an altar to the unknown God." MISS RYE, a noble English woman, has just made her thirty-second voyage across the Atlantic with a cargo of "wastrels," or street-waifs,—girls collected from the highways of London. These girls are taken to Canada and placed in respectable families, and, in almost every instance, have obtained comfortable homes and led virtuous lives. The work has been carried on for about ten years.

THE DAYS of sneering at Carl Schurz as an impractical theorist are ended. He is the one department of government at Washington in which the circulation of the drummers for republican campaign-funds is prohibited. His department is also conspicuously managed on business principles in other respects. A veteran correspondent at the capital says Mr. Schurz is "the best head the Department of the Interior ever had."

MR. UNDERWOOD'S CONCLUSIONS.

FRIEND EDITOR:—

I have read B. F. Underwood's lecture in THE INDEX of the 14th inst., and in respect to it have to say: Had it been written a few years ago it might have passed muster, but, since his masters have become agnostics, the idea which he expresses has become stale, and smells as the manna of last year. I am surprised at B. F. U., that he is not more abreast of the age, and that he does not know that the competent of his school have admitted, with Professor Tyndall, "that science is rendered dumb"; and further he says: "Let us lower our heads and acknowledge our ignorance, priest and philosopher, one and all." Now when the masters of B. F. U. admit that they stand in the presence of the "Incomprehensible,"—nay, of "two Incomprehensibles"—I use Tyndall's language, who also says, "I, however, reject neither," alluding to the instrument and the performer, shall he be wiser? And in connection with this subject Tyndall also says the matter of consciousness eludes all mental presentation. Now we all must believe in consciousness, and here at once B. F. U. will perceive that atheism has not a leg left to stand upon, and that he must also follow his masters who have become agnostics, which is but another name for a "know-nothing."

Now a great lesson is herein, and science is told to keep within her own province, and in it we all agree that she has worked wonders; but in leaving the material ground wherein she and her discoveries inhere of necessity, and attempting and assuming to instruct mankind in matters of philosophy and morals, her failure has been ludicrous, just as the wise man Socrates long ago foresaw when he attempted to put out his spiritual eyes by the material processes of physical science; and the absurdity of solving the problem of life by dwelling in and dealing with its phenomenal conditions, he warned his friends against with pointed sarcasm and keen reproach.

And what to-day is the condition of science, when, leaving her proper sphere, she proudly enters her claims to spiritual vision? When she attempts with a coup d'état to investigate the how and wherefore of things?

Why to day none so poor to do her reverence! Her great high priest, who a few years since was so boastful and so scornful in his rejection of an "outside builder" of the world, and of the old "groes" and "heathen" notion of a soul, and who could not believe in the Infinite One because for him there exists in the mind no "capacity for distinct mental presentation," might have held this position, but for the one fact of human consciousness; and herein he and his school are dumb and confounded, because the "thing eludes all mental presentation."

His great trouble is that matter will not in all cases act as matter should,—will not remain dumb and unconscious: all very well in the case of the frost upon the window-pane; but in the brain, "states of consciousness enter as links into the chain of antecedence and sequence which gives rise to bodily actions." Why, he asks "should the molecular motions of the brain be yoked to this mysterious companion consciousness?"

It is clear that God is not accessible to human scrutiny as in the days of Job. He was not and is not; but he is accessible to faith, and faith is correlated with morals, as Spencer confesses "that a religious system is a normal and essential factor in every evolving society." Thus it is only second rate men of science who speak the language of a few years ago. All is now being changed, and in some form or another all men of philosophic ken are acknowledging her of whom Plutarch writes who was expressed in the inscription on the temple of Neith at Sais: "I am that was, and is, and is to be; and my veil no mortal hath yet drawn aside." The name Neith means "I came from myself."

It will be seen from what I have written, that I do not agree with B. F. U., "that the coming man will not worship God"; but on the contrary that he will have a more intelligent conception of Deity. Now that he has realized as never before his impotence to destroy or create one atom or one molecule, or to conceive the how of anything which God has produced,—now that he knows that he is poised midway between—to use the language of Prof. Tyndall—"two Incomprehensibles,"—he will see, as Prof. Huxley has said, "Our volition counts for something," and he will use that volition upon the side of order! Thus he will become more and more competent in the sentiment of faith and morals, and will become more and more filled with the increase of wisdom.

The lecture which I have been criticising, of course contains many "unfounded assertions," to use the language of Agassiz in his last essay upon the subject of evolution. And to-day I would inquire whether the last words of this great man are not corroborated by the competent? The answer is clear that Darwinism is but a guess at best, says its most conspicuous advocates; and says Agassiz, "It has never been known that acquired qualities, even though retained through successive generations, have led to the production of new species, and, whatever be the means of preserving and transmitting properties, the primitive types have remained permanent and unchanged." And in respect to primitive types, this remains true just as it was when it was first written.

And in regard to man, supposing that his condition was as the relics found would seem to denote, it does not by any means follow that such was the condition of the Aryan race of whom we are the descendants.

CHRIST'S RESURRECTION.

TO THE INDEX:—

I have read in your columns the account of Orion Clemens' trial for heresy, and of his idea of the resurrection of Christ, etc. I am but an ignorant man and cannot understand history, ancient or modern, sufficiently well to be a critic. But it is strange to me that learned men have overlooked the fact that there was nothing preternatural in the life, acts, and rising of Jesus of Nazareth. I think it useless to deny his existence as some do, and yet nothing but the most persistent efforts of the priesthood could make anything strange of him in any way. His life was a foolish one, it seems to me, and he was persecuted as he would be to-day were he to spring up in the nineteenth instead of as represented in the first century (as called). He was nailed to the cross, and taken down in a fainting-fit. He was given to his friends, and recovered, appeared to his disciples, showed them the prints of the nails, and afterwards hid himself in the Isle of Patmos or somewhere else, and dictated Revelations when he was an old crazy man, in accordance with the prearranged plan that he and his disciples had formed.

The Bible does not claim that he stayed upon the cross long, or had his limbs broken as was customary; and it is a wonder to me that smart men in writing against his divinity neglect to take this common-sense view of the subject. Any physician knows that the whole account of his crucifixion does not necessarily imply that he died, and I cannot but think it foolish to suppose that he did. If the people of Boston should read such an account of a man in Georgia, would not every one say that he was in a trance or fainting-fit, rather than that he was dead and rose again? The idea of it being otherwise is simply preposterous.

THE WELLINGTON (N.Z.) Chronicle says: "The existence of a State church, supported to a very great extent by millions of people who do not believe in that church, and who have, moreover, to support their own churches besides, must be considered as a monstrous and crying injustice, disgraceful to a nation occupying such a lofty position on the scroll of honor as England holds. A religion which cannot subsist without being bolstered up by State aid can have no inherent vitality, and a religion without life cannot too soon be allowed to sink into the limbo of oblivion."

THE CRIMINAL RETURNS of London for the year 1878 have just been published. It appears that 83,746 persons were taken into custody by the Metropolitan police. The total number of arrests for 1878 is far larger than any year since 1831, the number of persons arrested in 1877 being 77,892, and in the year before 76,214. Of the 83,746 taken into custody last year, 58,122 were males, and 27,624 females. Of these, 7,722 males and 4,999 females could neither read nor write; 46,085 males and 22,417 females could read and write imperfectly, or could read only. By far the greatest number of offences come under the head of drink, for the return shows that 19,181 persons were taken into custody for being drunk and disorderly characters, while 18,227 were prosecuted for drunkenness.—National Reformer.

MR. W. LANT CARPENTER describes, in the Bristol Mercury, a visit he recently paid to Mr. Edison's laboratory at Menlo Park. The laboratory, workshops, etc., he states, as well as some isolated buildings for delicate electrical measurements, are spread over an acre of ground, railed in, admission to which is only given to privileged visitors. While waiting for Mr. Edison, Mr. Carpenter was conducted by a messenger through all the physical, chemical, and private experimenting laboratories, and then through the workshops, the machinery of which is driven by a beautiful, high-pressure, eighty-horse engine, also used to drive the electric-light machinery, most of which is in the same shop. About a dozen workmen were engaged, some in electrical test measurements, etc., but chiefly in manufacturing Mr. Edison's latest form of telephone, constructed for the electric and hygrometric conditions of our English atmosphere.

THE REV. GEORGE ANTHONY DENISON, vicar of East Brent, who is perhaps the only really contented churchman in the kingdom, writes to the Daily News to make an extraordinary proposition,—that the clergy and laity should assemble in London next November "to organize an association upon the basis following: The preserving the Prayer Book as it is, absolutely intact." Mr. Denison is determined to do his utmost towards retaining the threatened Athanasian Creed and the "ornaments rubric, without alteration, note, or new rubric subjoined." This energetic Old-World clergyman has "nailed his colors to the mast." He declares that "what remains to him of life he devotes to the promoting the organization here proposed." We respect the zeal of the Archdeacon, in an age when earnestness of purpose and fixity of conviction are not especial characteristics of the people; but his declining years might be better spent than in a vain attempt to arrest the progress of the tide.—Secular Review.

JESTINGS.

SHE WAS AN ALBANY lady who informed a visitor who came to see her new house that she was having "nicks made in the walls in which to place statues, and in one of them a bust of her husband."—Ottawa Herald.

THE Independent relates that a girl who had been very observant of her parents' mode of exhibiting their charity, being asked what generosity was, answered: "It's giving to the poor all the old stuff you don't want yourself."

A CLERGYMAN, lecturing one afternoon to his female parishioners, said: "Be not proud that our Lord paid your sex the distinguished honor of appearing first to a female after the resurrection, for it was only done that the news might spread the sooner."

A FELLOW WROTE to a down-town store as follows: "Dere sur: if yew hev gut a book called Daniel Webster on a brige, please send me a copy by Pysser's express c. o. d.—I want to git it termorrer if I kin, c use my spelln teacher says I oughter hev it."

AN ODD STICK of a preacher preached from the text, "Where art thou?" and thus divided his discourse into heads: I. Everybody is somewhere. II. Many are where they ought not to be. III. If they don't look sharp they will be where they won't want to be.—Vteland Independent.

WORTHY MAGISTRATE: "What! a man can be cruel enough to maltreat his lawful wedded wife, and even hurl a plate at her head?" Prisoner: "But, your honor, do you know my wife?" Worthy Magistrate: "I have not that honor." Prisoner: "Then just go slow."—N.Y. Tribune.

A CLEVELAND lady who has lately passed a few weeks in Paris always refers to her kitchen girl as her "fille de cuisine." Her son will insist on referring to the worthy domestic as "our pot, rasher," much to his mother's horror; but he hasn't had the benefit of a fortnight in "Paris."—Cleveland Voice.

AMONG THE MANY things to make a fellow feel bad in this world, one is to have a flat-nosed, freckled little man come in and take your seat by the side of a nice girl in a horse car while you are making change and putting her fare in the box. Of course you can take him by the collar and roll him in the sawdust, but the comfortable feeling has got away from you and will not return during the trip.—Cambridge Tribune.

LADY CLARA ROBINSON (née Vere de Vere) is subject to fits of radicalism; after suddenly informing her daughter Gwendoline that kind hearts are more than coronets, and simple faith than Norman blood, she gives her permission to go and play with "those nice daughters of the people." Gwendoline Robinson: "You may play with me, little girls." Small daughter of the people: "If you please, mums, mother don't like us to play with strange children!"—Punch.

THE INTERMENT QUESTION.—Old Gentleman (disturbed over his Times after breakfast): "There's a powerful smell of cooking comes in from the window, Hannah." (Sniffing). "Can you—?" Hannah (nearly in tears): "I was agolt' to speak to you, sir. The poor old cat died last night, sir, and the young gentlemen" (his two little nephews on a visit) "said they'd bury it in the garden for me; 'stead o' which they're a—they're a"—(breaking down) "cree-matin' of it over there by the stables, sir."—Punch.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in answer to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position.
